US Defense Secretary: We will Help Israel Defend Itself

US Defense Secretary Ash Carter was warmly welcomed by his Israeli counterpart Monday on the first Cabinet-level US visit to the Jewish state since the Iran nuclear deal was announced. The Pentagon chief met at Israel's defense headquarters with Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon and on today is to meet with Prime Minister Netanyahu, who has strongly criticized the Iran deal. In a joint press conference held by the two defense chiefs, Carter said the US would do all it could to help Israel defend itself including continued funding for missile defense, joint training, and advanced equipment like the F-35, which Israel will receive before all other international partners next year.

EU to Pitch New Formula in Bid to Jump-Start Peace

The EU said Monday it will explore setting up a new international format to breathe life back into the stalled peace process between Israel and the Palestinians. EU foreign affairs chief Federica Mogherini, fresh from her role in the Iran nuclear deal, said she was working on an idea for an "international support group." "We have invested a lot as the EU" in trying to revive the moribund Middle East peace process, Mogherini said after a meeting of the bloc's 28 foreign ministers in Brussels. "The idea of an international support group is one that we will explore in coming weeks. We will come back to it once I have discussed it with regional actors," she said.

EU to Israel: Halt Forced Population Transfers

The foreign ministers of the EU on Monday discussed what they perceived to be obstacles to peace, including what they termed "forced transfers", settlements. A list of decisions made at the meeting stated that among other things, the EU "calls on Israeli authorities to halt plans for forced transfer of population and demolition of Palestinian housing and infrastructure in the Susya and Abu Nwar communities." The decision went on to state that the EU "reiterates its strong opposition to Israel's settlement policy and actions taken in this context, such as evictions, forced transfers including of Bedouins, illegal outposts, settler violence and restrictions of movement and access." The statement concluded that "these actions seriously threaten the two-state solution."

Iran Dismisses Germany's Call to Recognize Israel

Iran dismissed a German official's appeal that it recognize the State of Israel's right to exist, saying its stance is not going to change following the signing of a nuclear accord. "We have totally different views from Germany on certain regional issues in the Middle East and we have explicitly expressed our viewpoints in different negotiations," Foreign Ministry Spokeswoman Marziyeh Afkham said Monday, according to the Fars news agency. She added that "this is not something new."

UN Security Council Endorses Iran Nuke Dea

The United Nations Security Council unanimously endorsed on Monday the nuclear deal between Iran and world powers reached last week in Vienna, as well as the lifting of some sanctions. The resolution will take effect in 90 days. Earlier, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu sent a message to U.S. lawmakers in congress, in attempt to try and convince them to oppose the nuclear deal with Iran. "The United Nations Security Council resolution (endorsing the agreement with Iran) isn't the last word," Netanyahu said during a Likud faction meeting in Jerusalem. "As long as the sanctions imposed by the U.S. Congress are in effect, Iran would have to make concessions."

UN Recognizes NGO Claimed to have Ties to Hamas

The United Nations approved UN accreditation Monday for the London-based Palestinian Return Center in a defeat for Israel which claims the organization is affiliated with Hamas and "openly promotes terrorism." The center, which describes itself as an independent consultancy dedicated to find a solution for the Palestinian refugees in accordance with international law, has denied the Israeli allegations. Last month, the UN committee that accredits NGOs, recommended that the center's application be approved. But Israel circulated a resolution, co-sponsored by the US, Australia and Canada, to the committee's parent body, the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC), opposing the application. In Monday's vote, 13 countries supported Israel's resolution, 16 were opposed and 18 abstained, meaning the resolution was defeated and the application was approved.

ADL sets Bar for Congress Approval of Iran Deal

The Anti-Defamation League has joined a growing list of major American Jewish organizations demanding tough questions to be answered by and for Congress, over the strength of the Iran nuclear deal, or else they will insist that the US legislature reject it. The American Israel Public Affairs Committee, B'nai B'rith International, the Orthodox Union and AJC have all voiced deep concern or outright opposition to the deal announced last week by Tehran and international powers. “Congress should critically examine how the deal would be implemented, whether it can, in fact, effectively safeguard America and its allies from the threat posed by a nuclear Iran, and consider additional appropriate policies and measures that will decrease the likelihood Iran will become a nuclear weapons state,” said ADL chair Barry Curtiss-Lusher and Abe Foxman, ADL's national director.

Bennett Scolds Lapid for Iran Inquiry Call

Education Minister Naftali Bennett chastised Yesh Atid party leader Yair Lapid on Monday for his public criticism of the government’s handling of the Iranian issue, as well as his call for an inquiry on the matter. “Every soldier knows that you don’t conduct an investigation during a battle. If you don’t want to help, at least don’t interfere,” he said during a Jewish Home faction meeting, according to the NRG news site. Bennett was reacting to Lapid’s call on Saturday to establish a state commission of inquiry into what he said was Netanyahu’s diplomatic failure regarding the newly signed nuclear deal with Iran. “When you speak in Hebrew and attack us, the world knows how to translate it. I expect our politicians to act responsibly, especially at this time,” Bennett said.

New York Times -July 20, 2015

A Good Deal for Israel

By Chuck Freilich

The prime minister of Israel, Benjamin Netanyahu, responded to the Iran deal as expected: It is bad, endangers Israel, he argued; we are against it and will be the only American ally not only to oppose it, but to go down gloriously, fighting a battle in Congress that we are destined to lose.

Mr. Netanyahu often warns that Iran is like Nazi Germany in 1938, fooling naïve appeasers even as it plans a cataclysm for Jews. But only those who never see merit in any proposal and never initiate their own could respond as the Israeli leader has.

Not that the agreement is without faults. President Obama negotiated from a position of weakness and conveyed a message that failure to obtain a deal was not an option. He misguidedly took the military option off the table long ago and made it clear that a return to sanctions would be a poor outcome.

Indeed, Iran will be allowed to retain its nuclear infrastructure instead of dismantling it, and most parts of the agreement are limited to 10 to 15 years, instead of being permanent. It remains to be seen what inspections Iran will actually allow, and the dispute resolution mechanism is cumbersome.

The agreement also does not address Iran's destructive regional role, including its support for terrorism. In fact, the added revenue it will receive as a result of the relaxation of sanctions may enable more aggressive action.

So, yes, we could have gotten a better deal. Israel wanted something different (as did the United States), but this is the agreement that was reached — and despite its faults, it is not a bad one. Crucially, it will contribute to Israel's security.

will not face the danger of annihilation. For Israel, that is a major achievement. It will enable Israel to divert precious resources to more immediate threats, like Hezbollah's more than 130,000 rockets, Hamas and the Islamic State, and no less important, to pressing domestic needs.

No agreement is ironclad, but the inspections provisions provide a high degree of confidence that Iran will not be able to renew the nuclear program without its being detected. A regime that has staked so much on this agreement will be reluctant to incur the costs.

It was Israel that decided years ago to give priority to the nuclear issue, as an existential threat, over all other Iranian transgressions, and concluded that if we can just resolve the nuclear threat, that would be good enough. Malign as Iran's other actions are — its regional role, support for terrorism and more — they can be dealt with at a later date; the overriding priority is the nuclear threat.

By portraying the issue in absolute terms, Mr. Netanyahu obfuscated the fact that the agreement is not the end of the story, merely another stage in a decade's long struggle to prevent Iran from going nuclear. Both Israel and the United States wanted a knockout blow; what we got was a punt.

The nuclear issue has not been resolved, but postponed for at least 10 years. When the agreement expires, or in the event of a violation, the international community may have to resume its efforts. Iran has not given up its long-term nuclear aspirations.

The agreement's detractors have been long on invective, short on suggestions. A collapse of the talks would have freed Iran to go forward and left America struggling to maintain a sanctions regime weakened by international disunity. Israel would have remained isolated, left only with the military option. These are hardly desirable outcomes.

Israel may, at some point, still have to go the military route, but it is abundantly clear that no one in Jerusalem has been avid to do so. Had Mr. Netanyahu wanted to launch an attack, he had many chances. But for very good reasons, not the least of which was American opposition, he did not.

An attack probably could not have achieved more than a few years' postponement of Iran's program, whereas the agreement will do so for at least 10 to 15 years. After the deal expires, it's conceivable that Iran will prefer to avoid becoming an international pariah again.

Over decades, Israel has built a unique alliance with the United States. This partnership has provided Israel with extensive aid, turned the Israel Defense Forces into one of the world's most advanced militaries and safeguarded Israel's interests in hostile international forums. Without America, the I.D.F. would be an empty shell, and Israel would be isolated and sanctioned.

Part of being a junior ally is knowing when to say, "Enough, we have made our case, time to be a team player." Nothing is more important for Israel's security than the vitality of its relationship with the United States — which Israel will still need in order to deal with Iran in the future.

Chuck Freilich, a former deputy national security adviser in Israel, is a senior fellow at Harvard's Belfer Center.

Ynet News – July 21, 2015

Before we Storm Capitol Hill

As Netanyahu tries to muster a majority in US Congress against deal with Iran, It's important to hold a profound debate in Israel on whether no agreement is preferable to a signed agreement with components that are crucial for Israel's security.

By Efraim Halevy

The importance of the agreement reached in Vienna is not only in the detailed arrangements aimed at blocking Iran's way to a military nuclear weapon in the coming decade, but also – and that's as important – in the fact that the document was also signed by Russia and China.

This is a rare moment in the complicated relationship between the United States and Tehran's two pronounced friends and main weapon providers. Iran isn't the only country which made concessions in the tough negotiations that were held until the very last moment. Moscow and Beijing committed to it too.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is trying to muster the required majority in the US Congress against the agreement. US President Barack Obama has already announced that he plans to veto such a decision, which would cause the agreement to collapse and erase all the concessions made by Iran.

Without an agreement, Iran will be free to do as it pleases, while the sanctions regime will anyway crumble, as many of the world's countries will rush to Tehran to sign profitable contracts. The US will then lose its influence over the situation in the 18 months left until the end of Obama's term, its leadership will be castrated and humiliated, while Israel will only remain with the independent military option. That's what British Foreign Secretary Philip Hammond referred to when he said that Netanyahu is not interested in any agreement with Iran, regardless of its content.

Hammond's impression is gaining strength in light of the major changes taking place in the Israeli strategy these days. At first, Israel maintained that the Iranian threat is a unique, existential threat which must be dealt with separately. The entire international community teamed up for this purpose, and that was the only goal of the biting sanctions against Iran. Israel had its work done by others. After all, it wasn't Israeli sanctions which forced Iran to report to the negotiations. Israel wanted others to do what was required, and they did.

The message sheet in the government spokespeople's hands overturns the previous Israeli strategy by cancelling the nuclear issue's uniqueness. The attempt to change the rules of the game and include additional demands from Iran in the agreement, like recognizing Israel and halting the support for terror, shows that Netanyahu has no interest in any agreement. Why if the nuclear issue is of existential-cardinal importance, what is the point in annulling an agreement which keeps Iran away from the bomb in order to try and insert clauses regarding terror, which is definitely not an existential threat to Israel? As far as terror is concerned, other economic and financial sanctions have been declared, and they will remain valid.

The declaration that Israel will not be committed to the agreement is unnecessary, and many even see it as ridiculous. Israel was never a side to the negotiations, and it is not committed to their results in any event.

Iran made concessions in a series of critical matters – it loathed the actual detailed discussion of its nuclear plans, and it has been hit with serious restrictions for the next 10 to 15 years. In the Middle East, a decade is eternity. Iran was also forced to agree to an invasive and unique supervision regime like no other in the world. The agreement even allows inspections at sites which supreme leader Ali Khamenei announced that he would not let inspectors into. In addition, the agreement sets a – complex but clear – process giving a forum with a clear Western majority the possibility of restoring the sanctions even without Russia and China's consent. And this is only a partial list of the concessions.

A moment before we storm Capitol Hill, led by the Israeli ambassador to Washington, it's important to hold a profound debate in Israel on whether no agreement is preferable to an agreement which includes components that are crucial for Israel's security. There will be no other agreement and no other negotiations. What is better, a signed agreement or no agreement?

Dear Jake and John:

I'm sending this to you at the suggestion of my friend Lorraine Hariton. By way of introduction, back in 1980 I helped Norman Lear create People For the American Way -- even before Tony Podesta came into the picture. I spent months traveling across the country with Norman meeting with so many people to talk about the rise of something Norman was seeing -- the rise of the Religious Right and its impact on our politics. You know the rest.

Currently, I am one of the producers of a film adaptation of the award wining children's classic, A Wrinkle in Time, that Jennifer Lee (FROZEN) is scripting for Disney. I mention this, because this book has meant a great deal to millions of young people over the past 50 years. Even Sheryl Sandberg was quoted in the New York Times during an interview for her book, Lean In, that A Wrinkle in Time was her favorite childhood book.

Wrinkle was written in 1962 and received the Newberry Award for children's literature in 1963, the year I first read it. As you will read in this note, 1963 was quite a tumultuous year. The year before, in 1962, the Cuban missile crisis threatened the world with the possibility of nuclear war. Against a backdrop of uncertainty, death, and fear, A Wrinkle in Time, came along at a time when young people needed a way to understand the changing world around them. It wasn't necessarily a conscious need, more a longing or yearning for a way to comprehend the evil that existed, and to feel comforted by a story that helped us see that it could be overcome. I think the need for a vision of a loving and empathetic universe is as needed today as it was 50 years ago.

I'm writing a book about my 50 year journey to make Wrinkle into a movie and have been doing research on the past 5 decades which moved me to write this note to Lorraine this morning.

Lorraine-

Just wanted to send along a few thoughts re today's Post story on HRC. First, hope you are enjoying your time in NY. The emails and phone calls about the campaign are very helpful.

Something struck me in reading the Post piece that you may want to consider. When Hillary speaks of the email issue or other issues, her counter is "politics as usual." Those very words are what contribute to the general feeling of her tone deafness. I have no idea what is said in your discussions, but I assume lots of very smart, savvy people are thinking about this problem everyday. Most people do not know what she really means when she says "politics as usual' and it might help her if she were more precise in her reply. What I mean by that is not to use words that mean something to people who follow politics, but use words that mean something to people who don't. And, "politics as usual' is immediately heard as "politics as usual in Clinton-world."

Take every single opportunity she has to explain in the simplest way over and over again that she represents change to a more conservative way of thinking and rather than talk about the need for inclusivity in all things for all Americans, her opponents only want to instill fear about her as a person and the change she represents.

I've been doing a little research on the big historical events over the past 50 years and it is a real awakening to take in how much change this country has been dealing with ever since 1963.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary's candidacy is an accumulation of a 50-year shift in attitudes and ever since the early 1970s a backlash to this change has taken shape and strengthened. It's not a vast right wing conspiracy - it is real fear of change. When she uses the words ‘politics as usual’ it only helps to strengthen that backlash.

She needs to be seen and heard as someone who can lead us to a more empathetic world where we can learn to actually get along with those who are different than us.

Take a look at what happened in 1963:

George Wallace became Governor of Alabama and proclaimed “segregation now, segregation tomorrow, and segregation forever. “

Betty Friedan’s The Feminine Mystique launched the reawakening of the women’s movement in the United States as women’s organizations and consciousness raising groups spread.

70,000 marchers arrived in London to demonstrate against nuclear weapons.

Martin Luther King, Jr. issued his Letter from Birmingham Jail.

The US Supreme Court ruled that state-mandated Bible reading in public schools was unconstitutional.

Pope Paul VI succeeded Pope John XXIII and continued the Vatican Council II. Priests were now asked to celebrate Mass in the language of the countries in which they lived, face the congregation, and not only to be heard and seen but also to signal to worshippers that they were being included because they were a vital component of the service. No longer was prayer to be seen as a performance, but active participation.

The United States, United Kingdom, and Soviet Union signed a nuclear test ban treaty.

Martin Luther King, Jr delivered his I Have A Dream speech on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial to an audience of 250,000 people participating in the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedoms.

South Vietnamese President Diem was assassinated following a military coup.

“ I Want to Hold Your Hand” and “ I Saw Her Standing There” were released in the U.S., marking the beginning of Beatlemania on an international level.

President John F. Kennedy was assassinated.

And the 1970s became fertile ground for even more divisiveness:

As the protests against the Viet Nam war intensified, the backlash began to take shape. When Richard Nixon won the presidency in 1968 he dismantled programs put in place by President Johnson’s War on Poverty. The anti-war protests increased in frequency and no longer only w ere students protesting, but professors, scientists, and stay at home mothers.

In response to protesters, hippies and the new drug culture, President Nixon’s ‘silent majority,’ -- mostly white working and middle class voters, were angry at what they saw as the destruction of a country they had known and loved.

The nation seemed to tear apart at the seams as America watched the live coverage of the Watergate hearings. When President Nixon finally resigned from office in 1974 the seeds of government mistrust were firmly rooted.

The women’s rights movement took hold when Congress approved the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) to the Constitution in 1972. Twenty-two of the necessary 38 states ratified with no difficulty, but the conservative faction in the country saw it as a threat to the traditional role of wife and mother and successfully fought back and defeated it.

The 1980s were a difficult period for Democrats. I remember helping to mount the Democratic convention in 1984 and standing on the podium that last night looking at a sea of waving American flags, excited that the first woman had been nominated for Vice President, inspired by Mario Cuomo's speech about the "two cities on a hill" and all I could think about was my dog. I didn't believe in any of it anymore. Reagan had done a great job of making the word liberal sound like a dirty word. Few Democrats had passion back then- we were so splintered and couldn't get along which lead to the creation of Democratic Leadership Forum and the eventual rise of Bill

Hillary is the embodiment of the changes that have been bubbling up since 1963. She is a woman embracing the need to include everyone at the table. But, she is falling into a trap that started in the 80s -- demonizing her opponent. That happened back in the 80s to raise funds. Direct mail campaigns for Dems, Republicans, and special interests groups had to demonize their opponents to fan the flames of fear to survive.

What Bernie Sanders represents is someone who doesn't seem to be caught in that demonizing cycle. There has to be a way for Hillary to rise above it, too, with humor, compassion and empathy. She needs new tactics, a new strategy and to breakaway fro m how she handled her adversaries in the past. She most likely first developed her deep distrust of conservative operatives in her formative years working as a lawyer during the Watergate hearings. That mistrust of Nixon and his associates left a lasting scar on so many of us. But, we need to move passed it.

Stephen Hawking said something recently that might help ground a new strategy:

“The human failing I would most like to correct is aggression. It may have had survival advantage in caveman days, to get more food, territory or a partner with whom to reproduce, but now it threatens to destroy us all. We need to replace aggression with empathy, which “brings us together in a peaceful loving state.”

Hillary needs to be President of the United States to act upon Hawking’s insight and her ability to lead must start with a new kind of campaign.

Catherine

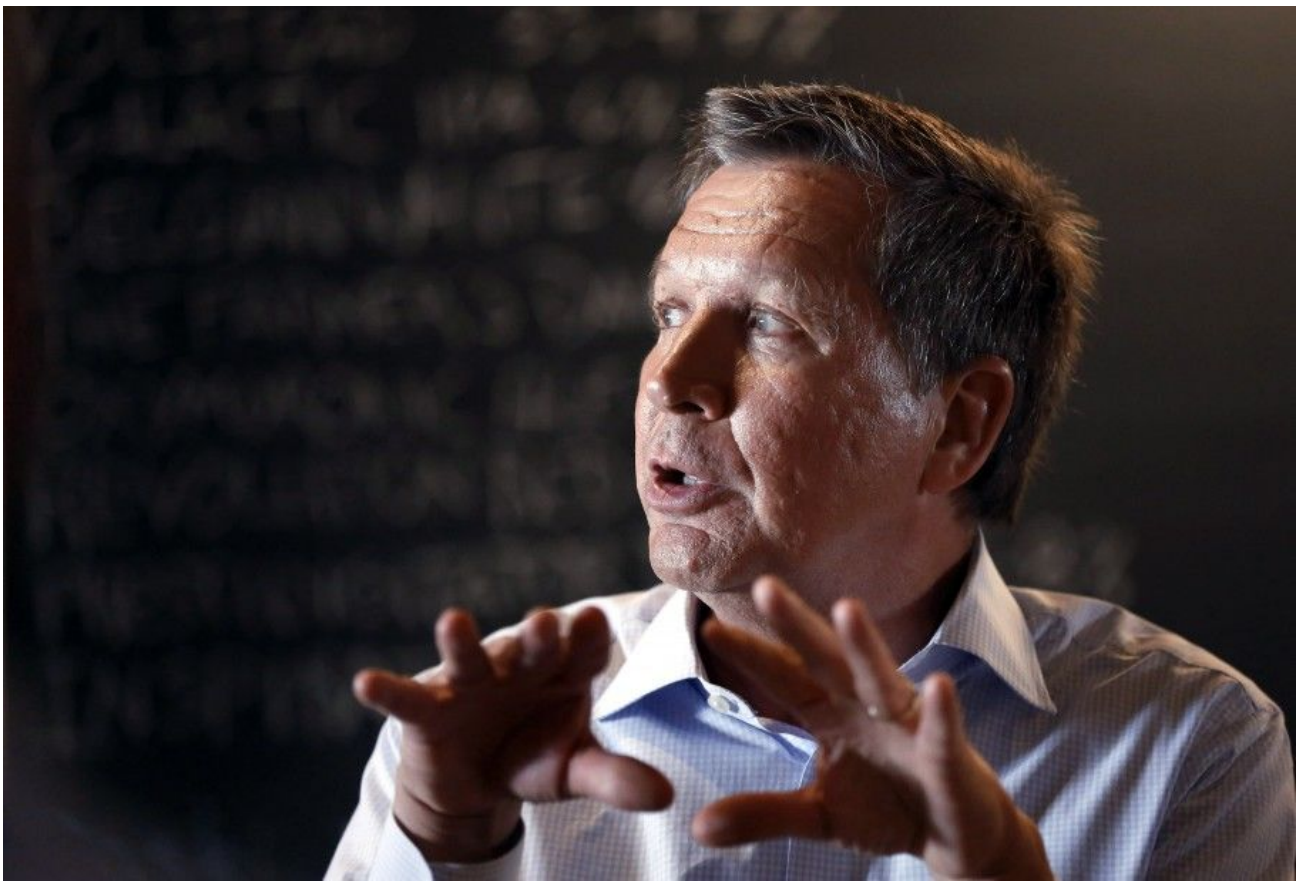
THE BIG IDEA:

CHARLESTON, S.C.—Donald Trump's South Carolina kickoff, postponed because of the church shooting here last month, and John Kasich's presidential campaign announcement at The Ohio State University both start at 11 a.m. this morning. Cable news will undoubtedly cover the New York businessman, under fire for his comment that John McCain is not a war hero, more than the sitting governor of Ohio, who could much more conceivably be the next president (or vice president). The split-screen contrast will show both sides of the now 16 candidate GOP field and reflect the extent to which Trump, who has taken leads in national and state polling, has drowned out almost everyone else. Neither Trump nor Kasich will speak from a teleprompter. That's about where the similarities end.

The jury is out on just how damaging Trump's POW gaffe will be. The Washington Post and ABC were in the field with a poll when Trump made his comments in Iowa Saturday; even after seeing his support drop dramatically on the final night of the survey, Trump came out at the top of the pack. He leads nationally with the support of 24 percent of registered Republicans and Republican-leaning independents. Scott Walker was in second place with 13 percent, just ahead of Jeb Bush at 12 percent.

Who is supporting Trump? "He does far better among those who are not college graduates than among those who are," Dan Balz and Peyton M. Craighill explain. "His support among men and women is about the same, and he performs somewhat better among GOP moderates than among those who say they are 'very conservative.' … There is clear resistance to his candidacy within the party. A majority (54 percent) say his views do not reflect the core values of the Republican Party … If Trump were to receive the GOP nomination, 62 percent of Americans say they definitely would not consider voting for him."



Trump as spoiler? The number in our poll that gives the GOP establishment heartburn: If he were to leave the GOP race and run for president as an independent, something he has not ruled out, our survey shows that Trump would currently get 20 percent in a three-way contest. Hillary Clinton would win with 46 percent, to 30 percent for Jeb Bush.

The latest—Interviewed by Bill O'Reilly on Fox News last night, Trump appeared to soften his tone about McCain. "Certainly if there was a misunderstanding, I would totally take that back," he said. But then he insisted that McCain has not done a good job fighting for vets, something that veterans groups readily disagree with. O'Reilly admonished Trump: "McCain shouldn't be the whipping boy … I don't think McCain's the villain here." McCain, for his part, was more measured earlier in the day on MSNBC: "I think he may owe an apology to the families and those that have sacrificed in conflict and those who have undergone the prison experience in serving their country. Watch O'Reilly's interview with Trump here.

Pile on—The Des Moines Register editorial board calls on Trump to drop out of the race in today's paper: "By using his considerable wealth, his celebrity status, and his mouth to draw attention to himself, rather than to raise awareness of the issues facing

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

America, he has coarsened our political dialogue and cheapened the electoral process. He has become 'the distraction with traction' — a feckless blowhard who can generate headlines, name recognition and polling numbers not by provoking thought, but by provoking outrage … The best way Donald Trump can serve his country is by apologizing to McCain and terminating this ill-conceived campaign."

— Why John Kasich deserves to be taken seriously. His pitch boils down to the belief that he is the most qualified person to be president. In addition to his time as a chief executive, he served 18 years in the House, including as chair of the Budget Committee the last time the federal government balanced the budget. He also had a tour on the Armed Services Committee. Of the four sitting governors running for president, he is the only one who remains popular back home.

Kasich's theory of the case : "At this point, there are two races underway," Balz explains in his curtain-raiser. "One is a contest among some of the most conservative candidates for supremacy in Iowa. The other is a largely separate contest among those candidates seen as less conservative and more acceptable to the party establishment who doubt they can win in Iowa and will need to finish strongly in New Hampshire to stay alive. It is the New Hampshire contest that is most attractive to Kasich, according to his advisers. He has spent the past two years separating himself from some of the harder edges of the conservative movement. He has said often that he wants to define what it means to be a Republican."

Bracketing—

- From the right: The Club for Growth and other conservative groups plan to attack Kasich for expanding Medicaid today. President David McIntosh will warn of "the long-lasting consequences from his decision to burden Ohio with an ever-growing price tag for Medicaid expansion."
- From the left: Kasich worked at Lehman Brothers until the bank's collapse in the financial crisis. The Democratic National Committee will seize on the fact that today is the fifth anniversary of Dodd-Frank to tie him with Wall Street. Kasich says the law "went overboard."
- Trolling Trump: Retired Air Force Col. Tom Moe, a Vietnam veteran who spent five years in the Hanoi Hilton as a POW, will lead the Pledge of Allegiance before Kasich speaks.

WHILE YOU WERE SLEEPING:

— SCOOP from Jenna Johnson: Two groups supporting Scott Walker raised more than $26 million before the end of June. "The haul puts the Wisconsin governor in fourth place in the GOP's money race, behind Jeb Bush, Ted Cruz and Marco Rubio … The Unintimidated PAC, which was started in April by two of Walker's closest political advisers, has collected just over $20 million … Our American Revival, a nonprofit advocacy group Walker started in January that does not have to disclose its donors, raised $6.2 million … He also raised $5.9 million for Friends of Scott Walker, a state level account that can't be used for his White House run but shows his fundraising strength. … Aides have said they hope to have at least $40 million on hand by early next year. Nearly 300 people donated to the super PAC and 2,500 donated to the nonprofit political organization. Among the key non-Wisconsin donors to Walker's super PAC: Joe Ricketts, the billionaire founder of TD Ameritrade; supermarket magnate John Catsimatidis; and media mogul John Malone.

— The FBI recovered a pistol that may have been owned and used by one of the Marines killed by Chattanooga shooter Mohammad Youssef Abdulazeez, the Washington Post reported. Investigators want to know if the 9MM Glock was used in the fatal exchange and possibly wounded Abdulazeez. The incident has "prompted calls to arm military personnel at bases and other facilities, including recruiting center" where currently only military police can carry them.

Robert Menendez accused federal prosecutors and FBI agents Monday of lying to win a corruption indictment against him this spring, saying the Justice Department would 'stop at nothing' to try to convict the powerful lawmaker…According to the defense documents, the lead prosecutor allowed an FBI agent to falsely testify to the grand jury that HHS officials were 'perfectly clear' that Menendez had been seeking favorable treatment for his friend. GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

— Wall Street Journal, "Democratic Party Machine Shows Rust ," by Colleen McCain Nelson and Peter Nicholas: "A tepid economy and President Barack Obama's sinking approval ratings contributed to some of the Democratic losses last fall. The setbacks also revealed a withering of the campaign machinery built by Mr. Obama's team more than seven years ago. While Democrats held the White House, Republicans have strengthened their hand in statehouses across the U.S…After two presidential victories, Mr. Obama presides over a Democratic Party that has lost 13 seats in the U.S. Senate and 69 in the House during his tenure, a net loss unmatched by any modern U.S. president. Democrats have also lost 11 governorships, four state attorneys general, 910 legislative seats, as well as the majorities in 30 state legislative chambers. In 23 states, Republicans control the governor's office and the legislature; Democrats, only seven."

'I've got to figure it out before August 1, because my last paycheck was like $1,800 in June,' she says. '[I lost] friends and the jobs and the work and—oh, my God—so much at the same time.' And yet, Dolezal's claim on black womanhood still seems to be non-negotiable. Even in conversation with an actual black woman on the other end of the line or sitting in her cozy home, Dolezal unequivocally identifies as black."

Subject: Draft Qs for Moniz

Hi John-

Kristina, Pete and I put our heads together yesterday and came up with some draft Qs for your NCES Moniz interview. Please let me know if you have any edits or would like to see a question about any other topic.

When we get to a good place with these I can have the NV team print them out to drop off with your HFA briefing materials on Sunday.

Thanks!
Milia

Draft Qs for Moniz:

How can the DOE labs deliver on their core research mission while also driving broader market and commercial innovation? What can and should the US be doing to maximize the return on the investment in the national labs?

Background: In FY 2015 our federal funding for clean energy programs was about 6.6 billion dollars government and a large portion of that money goes through DOE's national labs. The president has requested a 15% increase in FY 2016 to 7.6 billion dollars. Could also ask Moniz how much money he thinks we should be spending on funding clean energy programs?

Six years in to ARPA-E, what are some of the success stories that you would highlight? What role will we see it playing in energy innovation going forward?

You've demonstrated leadership with other major economies through the clean energy ministerial and and through your work with China and with India. How do these countries see their energy futures?

DOE has been working to try to advance CCS technology. What do you see as its potential and what opportunities are available to for the US to move this technology towards commercialization?

As we see an increasing prevalence of extreme storms, wildfires, water shortages and other natural threats, what do you see as the biggest challenges facing our energy infrastructure and what will the US have to do to adapt?

It has become increasingly clear that our energy infrastructure is also vulnerable to cyber attacks. How can we protect our national grid from these new threats?

Given the increase in renewables that will be driven by CPP what are the opportunities and challenges we face in trying to reshape America's energy infrastructure? How will utilities have to change their business models to accommodate the growth in distributed renewable power?

Nuclear energy provides zero carbon base load power, but in an era of cheap natural gas it's harder for nuclear plants and new nuclear contraction to be cost competitive. What is your view of the future of US nuclear industry? What is DOE doing in terms of research and loan guarantees to support the development of nuclear power?

DOE has made a lot of investments in energy efficiency technologies. What are the most exciting technologies you've seen come on the market in the past few years?

You and the President just achieved an historic accord with Iran. What was it like to negotiate with your Iranian counterpart, Ali Akbar Salehi?

McCain Energy Plan: Same Old Drilling
New Radio Ad Calls for Support of Clean Energy Legislation

Washington, DC: In remarks today Senator McCain indicated that in his speech tomorrow in the heart of the fossil fuel industry, he will focus not on clean energy and fighting global warming but instead on opening America's coasts to drilling. "Tomorrow, I'll call for lifting the federal moratorium for states that choose to permit exploration. I think that this -- and perhaps providing additional incentives for states to permit exploration off their coasts --- would be very helpful in the short term in resolving our energy crisis," said McCain.

Statement of Carl Pope, Executive Director:

"The truth is that drilling our coasts will not solve our energy problems. Additionally, the federal moratorium exists because one state could jeopardize beaches in neighboring states with risky offshore drilling. An oil spill off the coast of Virginia would impact beaches, marine life, and tourism in New Jersey. More importantly, lifting the ban would do nothing to reduce gas prices for the average American family. It would take a decade to bring new leases into production and then they would only line the coffers of the oil industry, which raked in tens of billions of dollars in record profits last year."

"Oil companies are not even using the nearly 6,000 offshore leases they already own. Issuing new leases is just a license for them to destroy more of our public resources for their own profit, while doing nothing to help ease pain at the pump. Senator McCain has said that he supports fighting global warming and clean energy solutions—more off-shore drilling is antithetical to that approach. To protect consumers and get us on the path to a clean energy future, Senator McCain should instead support the Consumer-First Energy Bill currently in the Senate."

Separately, the Sierra Club today began running a radio ad in several Ohio media markets calling attention to Senator McCain's ironic use of windmills in Ohio TV advertising despite his failure to support renewable energy initiatives in the Senate, and asking him to vote for incentives for wind power and other renewables when they come up on the floor.

Full Script: NARRATOR "John McCain is running ads that feature windmills and, truth is, windmills --and the clean energy and jobs they generate have a large role to play in Ohio's future. But not because of anything John McCain has done. Fact is, John McCain opposes requiring the use of more wind and solar power to generate electricity -- he's argued against incentives for the clean energy industry while demanding billions in subsidies for nuclear power and refusing to impose windfall profits taxes on Big Oil. Clean energy is key to Ohio's economic future. The Consumer-First Energy bill gives John McCain the chance to support renewable energy and end subsidies to oil companies. Call Senator McCain at 202-224-3121. Ask him to stop spinning windmills and to start supporting them and other clean energy technology to help put Ohio back to work. Reuters: "High-profile New York event highlights Clinton's 'elite' image"

By Gabriel Debenedetti

September 22, 2014, 6:07 p.m. EDT

When Hillary Clinton rubs shoulders with financial executives and philanthropic giants at the Clinton Global Initiative's meeting this week, it will underscore the tension between her elite connections and populist image likely to feature in her expected 2016 presidential campaign.

Seen by liberal critics as a close ally of the global elite, she will have to appeal to middle class voters after facing criticism this summer that she is out of touch.

Clinton drew the ire of progressives and Republicans alike in June by saying she was "dead broke" after leaving the White House as first lady in 2001. And to her populist critics, nowhere is the tension between her status as an emblem of the elite and the need to connect to voters more apparent than in New York, where this week's meeting takes place.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It is a city where she appears with high-profile billionaires, but also a city led by progressive hero Mayor Bill de Blasio, her one-time campaign manager.

"If you look at her track record from the past, it is out of step with the current Democratic Party. Not on social issues, but definitely on economic issues, so we're going to be watching very carefully," said Charles Chamberlain, executive director of liberal group Democracy For America.

"There's no question the de Blasio wing of the party is ascendant," Chamberlain added, calling Clinton a leader of Democrats' "Wall Street wing" and saying her appearances with financiers are concerning.

Clinton represented New York as a U.S. senator, and both her 2016 campaign and that year's Democratic convention could be based here.

This week's annual meeting of the Clinton Global Initiative boasts celebrities like actors Leonardo DiCaprio and Matt Damon alongside business titans like Alibaba's Jack Ma and Goldman Sachs' Lloyd Blankfein. President Barack Obama will speak on Tuesday, at a hotel where early on Monday screens occasionally flashed thanks to sponsor Blackstone, the private equity giant.

Hillary Clinton's appearances with financial executives worry progressives who favor stringent bank regulations. But Clinton allies swat away such criticism by noting this week's event is based on philanthropy, and point to the foundation's work.

The initiative, part of the broader Clinton Foundation, brings together leaders to pledge to work on important global problems. Former President Bill Clinton created the foundation although now Hillary and daughter Chelsea also help lead it.

"CGI has helped improve the lives of over 430 million people in more than 180 countries and has worked to secure $103 billion to spur innovative solutions to make the world a better place," said Adrienne Elrod of pro-Clinton group Correct The Record.

LIBERAL GROUPS WARY

But liberal groups say they are keeping a wary eye on the summit.

"As business and political leaders converge in New York this weekend, the political atmosphere is set. An economic populist tide is sweeping the country," said Laura Friedenbach of the Progressive Change Campaign Committee, which heavily supports Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren.

But Clinton's recent speeches have hit a noticeably populist note, and she appeared with labor leaders in New York soon after returning to politically influential Iowa in mid-September.

And supporters of the former secretary of state point to preliminary polls that show Clinton with a considerable lead over potential liberal challengers in the Democratic primary field, including Warren.

A September CNN/ORC poll of Iowa Democrats showed Clinton with a 39 percent lead over Vice President Joe Biden, her closest competitor.

Peter Buttenwieser, a long-time Democratic donor, philanthropist, and Clinton supporter whose mother's family founded Lehman Brothers, said fears of a liberal backlash against Clinton were overblown.

"Most progressive candidates, including many who are running for the Senate this time, meet with business people, and there's nothing wrong with the vast majority of people who run good, successful businesses," he said.

Washington Post: "Clinton wonkparty outshines U.N. meeting"

By Anne Gearan

September 22, 2014, 3:46 p.m. EDT

NEW YORK — Which party would you rather go to: The one that begins with Leonardo DiCaprio, Eva Longoria and a rocking house band, or the one that begins with Brazilian President Dilma Rousseff?

Oh, and one of the gatherings this week in New York City also has former president Bill Clinton and his wife — you might have heard of her — former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton. Plus a due-to-give-birth-any-second Chelsea Clinton.

That event is the Clinton Global Initiative, which also boasted comic Seth Meyers and of-the-moment singers Jason Mraz and Aloe Blacc on the opening night Sunday, if you're keeping score at home.

Did we mention that Matt Damon is going to talk about clean water?

The meeting was established in 2005 as a three-day do-gooder wonkathon that took advantage of the spotlight of the other gathering — the annual United Nations General Assembly — to draw attention to development issues and other concerns.

Ten meetings later, the Clinton Global Initiative now outshines the U.N. gathering, at least when it comes to star wattage. It also serves as an annual company picnic and convocation of the faithful for the Clintons' far-flung political and business networks.

The whiff of a potential Hillary Clinton presidential run was everywhere as Greater Clintonia gabbed and gossiped in the lobby of the New York Sheraton, alongside the sort of Aspen-sleek corporate types and earnest advocates who attend sessions such as "Reimagining Finance for Social Impact: Planning For Scale."

"President Clinton is here! And so is Bill!" emcee Meyers joked Sunday, after she opened the glitzy awards banquet that inaugurated the gathering. (Bill grinned and applauded from the audience.)

Of course it isn't really fair to compare UNGA and CGI, as the natives of both lands call the gatherings. But probably only the Clintons could build an organization that is now in many ways a bigger draw than the august world gathering it was designed to complement.

Brazil's president will be the first of more than 150 leaders expected to address the United Nations beginning Wednesdaymorning. Rousseff is actually something of a rock star among world leaders and a fascinating story for foreign policy geeks because of her tough-talking persona. But it's a good bet that the Hollywood Reporter and US Weekly don't have assigned seats for her address, as they did for the CGI opening.

"There is a little sizzle with the substance," said CGI spokesman Craig Minassian, "but it draws people into the substance."

On Monday, the once-and-maybe-future presidents embraced warmly after Bill Clinton introduced Hillary Clinton. He outlined the accomplishments claimed by CGI: 430 million people in 180 countries helped by the pledges — or commitments, in CGI parlance — that participants must make to try to solve climate change, women's deaths in childbirth, the lack of libraries in rural societies or a host of other problems.

That adds up to action valued at nearly $100 billion, and 27 million people with greater access to safe drinking water, Hillary Clinton said. They are very big on big data at CGI.

“The last thing we want to do is just get into a rut where we just do the same things over and over again,” she said. “We have been asking ourselves, ‘How can we continue to reinvent philanthropy and business as effectively in the next 10 years as well as we have done in the past?’ ” she said.

Membership costs $20,000 annually for corporations and other large organizations but is free for many charitable and advocacy groups. Membership is also by invitation only and is capped at about 600 slots. There is no shortage of applicants.

“We have not renewed” some members who did not carry through on their pledges, Minassian said.

“At first I asked people to come to New York when the U.N. was meeting and the world leaders were coming, which guarantees that you could join the world’s worst traffic jam,” Bill Clinton joked. “And then I asked people to come to a meeting where you had to make a commitment to do something, and do your best to keep it, and keep coming.”

Those commitments began as back-of-the-envelope sketches of ideas and promises, and now keep about 100 people employed year-round shaping, refining and measuring the progress of each member’s performance.

It is that culture of expectations that sets CGI apart from other “thought leader” gatherings such as the World Economic Forum, which holds an annual uber-glossy gabfest in Davos, Switzerland.

“This is Davos with action items,” said John Wood, who credits CGI with nurturing his library- and school-building project, Room to Read. “It forces you to say what you are going to do, what is your time frame, how are you going to do it.”

There is some cross-pollination between CGI and UNGA. President Obama is set to address both organizations this year, for example. But many business and development professionals hobnob at CGI without getting anywhere near U.N. headquarters.

Not to mention the Hollywood contingent and their causes.

“The world is now at a turning point, and climate change is the defining issue of our time,” DiCaprio said as he accepted a CGI Global Citizen award. “The task before us to protect this planet will require the largest movement in human history.”

Associated Press: “Clintons Mark 10 Years of Annual Summit”

By Ken Thomas

September 22, 2014, 4:52 p.m. EDT

NEW YORK (AP) -- Bill and Hillary Clinton marked the 10th anniversary of the former president's annual Clinton Global Initiative, pointing to female empowerment around the globe as the former secretary of state considers a 2016 presidential campaign.

The Clintons presided over their yearly gathering of world leaders, corporate executives and philanthropists on Monday, drawing attention to the role of women in leadership positions and opportunities for women and girls around the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We cannot grow the global economy if we do not open the doors to women to participate in the economy," Mrs. Clinton said. "It's been quite exciting to see a lot of the changes that are going on, but it's also been somewhat distressing to see how hard change still is, including in my own country."

The conference theme is called "Reimagining Impact," a notion that might apply to a future presidential candidate. During a conversation on stage with Jim Yong Kim, president of the World Bank, and IBM CEO Ginni Rometty, the former first lady listened intently as the IBM executive spoke of the importance of constantly seeking transformation.

Reimagining impact, Hillary Clinton said at the end of the session, "requires leaders who will reimagine and who will be unafraid to do so and ask themselves, beginning with themselves, hard questions."

Bill Clinton, in a separate conversation with Chilean President Michelle Bachelet, said the rest of the world often views Latin America as a "real macho place" and might be surprised to learn that Bachelet had won a second term while Brazil is led by a female president, Dilma Rousseff.

"When there are no women in a high-level position, people can talk about equal rights but it's just a speech," Bachelet said. She said when female leaders excel, "then it's a model for others."

Since 2005, the Clintons said their efforts had improved the lives of 430 million people in 180 countries, including giving 44 million children access to a better education. The ex-president, who turned 68 in August, said he was glad to be joined by his wife and daughter Chelsea Clinton in the family foundation's pursuits.

"One of my ideas is that I want them to do more of the heavy lifting," he said. "You know, I'm not a young guy anymore."

Here's a look at other news from the Clinton Global Initiative:

---(equals)

- 2014 CAMPAIGN: Delving into politics, Hillary Clinton sent out a fundraising appeal Monday on behalf of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, urging activists to help elect House Democrats. Clinton has been stepping up her campaign activity for the party in the weeks before the November elections. Republicans hold a majority in the House and need to pick up six seats to take control of the Senate.

- SERVICE YEAR: Chelsea Clinton, who is expecting her first child in the coming weeks, announced the creation of Service Year, a four-year effort to encourage young people between the ages of 18 and 28 to take part in a year of service. The initiative, led by the National Service Alliance, the Cisco Fund at the Silicon Valley Community Foundation and the Lumina Foundation, aims to create 30,000 annual service opportunities by 2017 and 1 million a year by 2023.

- CLIMATE CHANGE: Mayors Annise Parker of Houston, Eric Garcetti of Los Angeles and Michael Nutter of Philadelphia announced plans for their cities to address climate change. The cities will develop plans to reduce greenhouse gas, adopt a common way of tracking and reporting emissions and promote ways of participating in cap-and-trade programs like California's system.

MSNBC: "Clinton family basks in the glow of the global elite"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

September 22, 2014, 7:51 p.m. EDT

The Clinton family relished their spot atop the extended network of friends and supporters they've built over the past ten years through the Clinton Global Initiative, using the first full day of the group's annual meeting on Monday to review their success with an eye toward the future – where a potential presidential run loomed in the shadows.

"I want to begin by making a totally unbiased, objective statement. I think my husband has invented an extraordinary initiative," Hillary Clinton said at the first major session of three days of meetings here. "And I can say this because I had nothing to do with creating CGI and I want to thank him for 10 years and so much that we have to celebrate and to build on."

The conference is now at a crossroads. Former President Bill Clinton started the annual event, operated under the auspices of the Clinton Foundation, in 2005 to bring together heads of state, titans of industry, celebrities, thought leaders, and philanthropists to make commitments to improve the world.

Now a family business, the conference was already thrown into question when Hillary Clinton became secretary of state, forced to curtail some of its activities and reveal its donors. If she decides to run for president again in 2016, CGI's future would be even more unpredictable, as the deals struck here could open her campaign (or White House) to charges of conflict of interest.

But for now, the Clintons were proud to tout the success they have achieved over the past decade. When she took the stage, Hillary Clinton ticked off an impressive list of accomplishments: 3,100 commitments from organizations and governments to do something good, nearly $100 billion promised, and 430 million lives affected in 180 countries. "Extraordinary," she said.

The conference, which is timed to coincide with the U.N. General Assembly, is like a who's who of do-gooder global elites.

It's the kind of place where Bill Clinton muses about a promise from the president of Mongolia to provide him with a strong horse ride across the steppe before quizzing the King of Jordan and the president of Chile on turmoil in the Middle East.

"Why did I run [for president] again? Because I just couldn't help it," Chilean president Michelle Bachelet, who is close with someone else at the conference who is considering a second run at the presidency, told Bill Clinton.

It's a rare place where Hillary Clinton does the interviewing, putting questions to the CEO of IBM and the World Bank. And where Tim Cook, the CEO of Apple is major star – but not as big as Leonardo DiCapio, who was given an award here Sundaynight.

While the point of the event is philanthropy, politics is never far away. Spotted were Clinton hands like Paul Begala, a longtime Clinton strategist who currently advises a big money pro-Clinton super PAC, and Gene Sperling, the Clinton and Obama White House adviser.

In the lobby, David Brock, the former professional Clinton hater-turned-chief Clinton defender, waited before some meetings with donors. He was not meeting with either Clinton this time, however, he said.

A big emphasis on this anniversary event was accountability for the money that has been committed over the years. Chelsea Clinton has taken a lead in evaluating the Clinton Foundation's work, commissioning an audit from an outside firm.

"One of the ways that CGI has grown over the years is that the rest of my family joined the business," Bill Clinton said with a laugh. "One of my ideas is that I wanted them to do more of the heavy lifting. You know I'm not a young guy any more."

The former first daughter, looking very comfortable despite the fact that her baby is due any day, is increasingly taking charge of the foundation. She strode on stage to report that almost 90% of projects are on track or have already been successful.

She also announced a new project, Service Year, which will help connect young people with one-year service opportunities, such as

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

AmeriCorps. Stanley McChrystal, the retired general who was demoted by President Obama after insulting the president in a Rolling Stone article, is involved in the effort and Chelsea praised him as “an example to all of us.”

The evaluation effort has left Hillary Clinton to think a lot about data, she said. “The idea that big data, information, can be valuable seems so obvious. Because who can be against information? But it turns out, a lot of people are because they don’t want information that violates their ideology or some other pre-existing belief or conviction that they have held,” she told Jim Yong Kim, the head of the World Bank.

Regardless of the future of the Clinton Global Initiative, it already serves as an ideal platform for Clinton to elevate herself and issues that would be important in a presidential run, not to mention stay in touch with potential donors and other influential people.

Twenty nine out of 30 companies listed on the Dow Jones Industrial Average have donated to the CGI, according to Bloomberg. And Democratic donors like Ted Waitt, the founder of computer maker Gateway, and investor Alan Patricof were among the sponsors of some programs.

Wall Street Journal: “Clinton World Braces for Big News on Baby Front”

By Peter Nicholas

September 22, 2014, 4:25 p.m. EDT

NEW YORK – The Clinton family is about to drop some big news – having nothing to do with Hillary Clinton’s presidential ambitions.

Back in April, Chelsea Clinton announced that she was pregnant with her and husband Marc Mezvinsky’s first child. Now, the family is signaling that the baby is due any day.

In an interview with CNN over the weekend, former president Bill Clinton said that he hopes to be a grandfather “by the first of October.” Mr. Clinton also said he didn’t know if the baby was a boy or a girl, as his daughter and son-in-law “decided not to know. They want to be surprised.”

Mrs. Clinton has also had some fun in describing life on tenterhooks as she awaits word of the baby’s arrival.

Speaking at a campaign event in Iowa earlier in the month, she said: “I’ve got a few things on my mind these days. First and most importantly, Bill and I are on constant grandchild watch.

“I’m calling Chelsea every five minutes to make sure things are going alright and when the big moment comes you can bet that I will drop everything to be there in a flash. So I’m telling you now, if you see us sprinting off stage, that’s why.”

Playfully, she added: “And then of course there’s that other thing.”

That other thing would be the presidency.

Can we connect the two? Let’s try.

If the baby arrives next week, the newest Clinton will turn 35 in the year 2049, missing the constitutional eligibility requirement for the 2048 election cycle — but making him or her fully eligible to run for president in 2052.

Looking very pregnant, Chelsea Clinton has made a few appearances thus far at the Clinton Global Initiative conference this week in New York. On Monday she took the stage to talk about AmeriCorps, the service project signed into law by her father.

Mr. Clinton had been leading a panel discussion with Michelle Bachelet, president of Chile, and King Abdullah of Jordan. The conversation ran long, and Mr. Clinton apologized to his daughter as he ceded the stage.

“You don’t need my forgiveness,” Chelsea Clinton told her father. “I’m always happy to listen to President Bachelet and his majesty. I think all of us are.”

She went on to praise her father for AmeriCorps. She called it “one of my father’s – in my humble opinion, as my mother said, we’re not terribly biased in our family – one of his signature achievements while he was president.”

Los Angeles Times: “Bill Clinton outlines 100-day agenda for next president”

By Maeve Reston

September 22, 2014, 8:29 p.m. EDT

Hillary Rodham Clinton seems more eager to talk about her soon-to-arrive grandchild than her plans for a potential presidential run, but her husband seemed more than happy to allude to both prospects Monday.

Bloomberg’s Charlie Rose interviewed the former president during the 10th Clinton Global Initiative in New York on Monday, the international gathering sponsored by his family's foundation. Rose danced around the specific question of whether Hillary Clinton will run in 2016, presumably because Bill Clinton has repeatedly insisted that he does not know. But he pressed Clinton for clues about what another Clinton presidency might look like, while encouraging him to expound about the changes in the U.S. political climate since he first ran in 1992.

“Let’s assume you are advising a presidential candidate,” Rose said, to laughter.

"That's a heavy assumption," Clinton quipped back. “My advice has sometimes been welcome, sometimes not. Sometimes right and sometimes not."

Regarding the next president’s first hundred days, Clinton said they should focus on helping people climb out of poverty into the middle class. He said he would favor a revived effort in building energy infrastructure and directing investments toward programs to create jobs that would also simultaneously change the job mix to create higher-paying positions. He also called for altering student loan programs to help students with debt, working on initiatives to make higher education more affordable and reforming the U.S. corporate tax system.

Clinton described the presidential campaign as a very difficult job interview. He did not explicitly discuss his wife’s ambitions.

Rose questioned Clinton about why people consider him to be “the best political animal that's ever been in American politics.”

“I don't know if that's true or not. But to be really good at this, you’ve got to like people; you’ve got to like policy; and you’ve got to like politics,” Clinton said. “You've got to have a pain threshold.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The former president said the nation's political and media climate was bad in the mid-1990s, but had gotten even more difficult because party politics "are even more polarized." While Americans are "less racist and homophobic" than they used to be, he said, they tend to be far less willing to spend time listening to those who don't agree with them, he said, calling that a dangerous trend.

Of course, one of the most buzzed-about topics at this year's Clinton Global Initiative has been the coming arrival of Bill and Hillary Clinton's first grandchild. A very pregnant Chelsea Clinton, who plays a leading role in running her family's foundation, appeared onstage during the Sunday night gala that launched the conference.

The younger Clinton, who announced in April that she was expecting a child with her husband, Marc Mezvinsky, playfully thanked Clinton Global Initiative attendees for their well wishes on their "impending, though hopefully not immediate, arrival."

On Monday, she took the stage to talk about a new service project championed by the Clinton Foundation that is designed to boost the work of AmeriCorps. Her father, who had been leading the previous panel with President of Chile Michelle Bachelet and King Abdullah of Jordan, apologized to his daughter for allowing his discussion to run over the allotted time.

"You don't need my forgiveness," Chelsea responded, teasing her father. "I'm always happy to listen to President Bachelet and his majesty. I think all of us are."

Chelsea's due date has been a closely guarded secret within the family, but Bill Clinton said during a CNN interview that he hoped to be a grandfather by Oct. 1.

The former president told CNN's Fareed Zakaria in the interview airing Sunday that his daughter and her husband decided not to find out whether the child is a boy or a girl, and said he didn't have a preference. "I can't wait," the former president said.

Hillary Clinton rarely delivers a speech these days without noting her excitement about what she calls "grandbaby watch." She has said the experience of becoming a grandmother could affect her thinking about running for president, and during her recent visit to Iowa she admitted that she was calling her daughter every few minutes to check in.

"When the big moment comes, you can bet that I will drop everything to be there in a flash," Clinton told the crowd at Sen. Tom Harkin's steak fry in Iowa. "So I'm telling you now, if you see us sprinting offstage, that's why."

Here in New York, the Clintons have been able to keep a watchful eye on Chelsea, who attended most of the conference's large events.

No one has sprinted offstage just yet. But both soon-to-grandparents seem to be enjoying this moment of anticipation.

Charlie Rose began his interview with the former president by noting that within a few weeks a child might arrive who would be calling him "Grandpa."

"If my grandchild can talk in one or two weeks, the future of my family is secure," Bill Clinton replied.

Rose quickly rejoined that he hadn't meant to say he was expecting the baby to be talking quite that quickly. But considering it's the loquacious Bill Clinton's grandchild, anything is possible.

Politico: "Hillary Clinton to campaign for Charlie Crist"

By Maggie Haberman

September 22, 2014, 7:56 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton will headline a fundraising dinner for Florida Democratic gubernatorial Charlie Crist next month, putting her in a key presidential state in the midterms battle, according to an invitation.

Crist, a Republican turned Democrat running for his old job, is in one of the toughest gubernatorial races in the country. He is facing incumbent Republican Rick Scott.

Clinton will headline a dinner Oct. 2 in Miami, according to an invitation.

She is holding a book-signing the same day in the state.

New York Times: "Seeding a Slogan? Clinton Talks Up Choice and Chance in Email Blast"

By Alan Rappeport

September 22, 2014, 6:10 p.m. EDT

Hillary Rodham Clinton has said that she'll likely announce a decision about running for president sometime next year. But from the sound of things, she might be trying out a campaign slogan already.

In a Monday e-mail titled "A Choice & A Chance," Mrs. Clinton dove right into the political fray, urging Democrats to make a donation to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

"This November, we have a clear choice — and a chance," Mrs. Clinton wrote. "It's a chance to elect Democrats to Congress who will fight for us every day."

The phrasing echoes remarks Mrs. Clinton has made in other appearances recently, including at a steak fry in Iowa last week, where she proclaimed that "in just 50 days Iowans have a choice to make — a choice and a chance — a choice between the guardians of gridlock and the champions of shared opportunity and shared prosperity."

A few days later, at a women's forum in Washington, she used the same line, reminding voters of the "choice and chance" to steer issues such as equal pay, health and education.

While Mrs. Clinton has not tipped her hand, she certainly has not closed any doors either.

CNN: "Tim Kaine: 'My intuition tells me' Hillary Clinton will run"

By Peter Hamby

September 22, 2014, 2:56 p.m. EDT

Sen. Tim Kaine of Virginia said Monday he thinks Hillary Clinton will run for president next year and that her decision could be known as soon as December.

Kaine, a Democrat who has vowed to endorse Clinton should she run, made the comments in a question and answer session with students at Randolph Macon College in Ashland, Virginia.

An audio clip of the event was provided to CNN by a person in the room who wished to remain anonymous.

The former governor and chairman of the Democratic National Committee was asked if he would run for president in 2016, but Kaine waved off the question and quickly pivoted to Clinton.

"The answer is no," he said. "I had come out in, I guess in April or May, to strongly support Sen. Clinton, Secretary Clinton, should she run. I have no knowledge about whether she will or won't, but my intuition tells me that she will. But that will probably not be known until, I would say, December."

Clinton has said publicly that she will make her decision about 2016 known sometime after the new year.

Kaine was one of President Obama's first supporters when Obama launched his presidential bid in 2007. With his impressive resume and a deep well of respect within Democratic Party ranks, Kaine has been talked about as a potential candidate himself in 2016.

But Kaine signed on with the Ready For Hillary super PAC earlier this year and announced that he will get behind Clinton if she seeks the Democratic nomination.

He will also host a Washington fund-raiser for the group on Tuesday, Politico reported last week.

CNN: "Republicans' favorite label for Hillary Clinton 2016: 'Obama's Third Term'"

By Dan Merica

September 23, 2014, 7:09 a.m. EDT

Republicans who want to taint Hillary Clinton are going to lengths to link the former secretary of state with President Barack Obama and his sagging poll numbers.

Throughout the party's infrastructure, Republicans say that linking Clinton with Obama, especially labeling her possible 2016 campaign as "Obama's Third Term," is the most potent attack.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

America Rising, an anti-Clinton super PAC that has looked to define the former first lady for the better part of a year, will push out a series of talking points giving Clinton the third-term label, and the group plans to fundraise off the push staring Tuesday.

"Hillary Clinton has a Barack Obama problem," reads a lengthy research document that will go out to GOP pundits, strategists, conservative organizations and media members Tuesday. "No matter how many of her advisors whisper to reporters that she's different from Barack Obama, Americans still know who she is: Barack Obama Part Deux."

The document lists "10 Reasons Why Clinton 2016 = Obama's Third Term," including her praise for Obama as she left the State Department in 2013, her role in his first four years of foreign policy and Clinton's support of Obamacare.

"Looking ahead to 2016, it's critical that Obama's 3rd Term is an element of the broader narrative defining Sec. Clinton, especially since she still has a higher approval than he does," Tim Miller, the group's director, said in a statement to CNN.

Multiple Republican operatives said this strategy -- which is coming from national party groups, outside super PACs and GOP politicians -- is best at engaging the base and raising money. Therefore, it is something they plan to continue in the coming months and possibly years.

Democrats, too, are concerned about the attack line. In August, some close to Clinton told CNN that labeling the former secretary of state as the successor to Obama's legacy was a possible problem.

"She was in his government, she was at his side," said one source. "That is, the way to go after her is four more years of the same old thing. The question they should ask her is 'Tell me 10 things that you disagree with him on.' "

Republican lawmakers -- including those who may challenge Clinton in 2016 -- have been quick to use some variation of Obama-Clinton in speeches, statements and interviews.

Republican Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas has been the most strident in linking Obama and Clinton, a tactic he first used after the former secretary of state headlined a CNN town hall in June.

"The most consistent error of the Clinton/Obama foreign policy is a failure to understand the nature of the people we're dealing with, of our enemies," Cruz said in an interview with CNN after the event.

According to a senior Cruz aide, the attack engages the senator's base and is something Cruz plans to use again.

"His mindset is it is not just Obama's failed policies, it is all of them," the aide said. "We want to draw attention to the fact that she owns this foreign policy and she is not speaking. She is supposed to be the leader, especially on foreign policy, and she is saying nothing. She has a voice, she doesn't use it."

Sens. Marco Rubio and Rand Paul, too, have been linking the two. In an op-ed earlier this month, Rubio called for voters to reject the "the veiled isolationism of Obama and Clinton," and Paul has looked to link the two on issues including terrorism and Syria.

For her part, Clinton has both distanced herself from Obama and drawn closer to him.

In her memoir, "Hard Choices," Clinton distanced herself from Obama on Syria and did so again in a much-talked-about interview with The Atlantic.

But the former secretary of state has also heralded Obama, like in Iowa this month when she touted his handling of economic issues as getting the country "on the road to recovery."

This is a common refrain for Clinton. At the Brookings Institution this month, she touted Obama's "extraordinary leadership," adding "thanks to the economic policies that were pursued by the President and endorsed by the Congress ... we are in a much stronger economic position than we were."

Whether she will continue this trend of heralding Obama while also distancing herself depends, according to former aides.

Donna Brazile, a CNN contributor and Al Gore's 2000 campaign manager, said whether or not Clinton needs to break with Obama "all depends on the political climate and environment in mid-2015 to 2016."

"In 2000, I had to answer this question," she said. "And the answer is always the same. Each year is different and every candidate must make his or her case to the voter of why they represent someone else."

New Republic: "How to Save Obamacare: Make It a Women's Issue"

By Brian Beutler

September 22, 2014

When Senator Mark Pryor, the embattled Democrat from Arkansas, produced an ad last month touting the Affordable Care Act's health coverage guarantee, a thousand Republican party operatives bombarded his campaign with the word "Obamacare." Pryor didn't voluntarily pin a scarlet "O" on his campaign, so Republicans did it for him. Fast forward to last week, when Michigan Governor Rick Snyder raised a glass to the "outstanding progress" of his state's Medicaid expansion, which has already enrolled nearly 400,000 new beneficiaries, and those same GOP operatives sat on their hands.

The upshot is simple. Remove the moniker, and the component benefits of the Affordable Care Act become real political assets. The moniker itself remains unpopular, though. Indeed, what remains of the campaign to repeal the Affordable Care Act is the blind faith that a rose by the name Obamacare will spontaneously putrefy. But though outright repeal has become impossible, Republicans still understand that any catchall for health care reform is a useful way to channel broader unhappiness with the president himself. The enduring unpopularity of reform as a whole is a testament to that fact, and to the likelihood that—absent an Obama favorability surge—these numbers won't change much for the next couple years. They might never change at all.

The challenge for the next Democratic presidential nominee is thus to break the psychic link—to reshape the way the public thinks about health reform as something more than just a proxy for Obama. And whether she realizes it or not, Hillary Clinton has made a strong case that a female candidate will be better suited to the task than a male candidate.

Last Thursday, Clinton joined a Center for American Progress panel about women's economic security, focused mainly on gendered issues like equal pay and child care. But Obamacare fits neatly into the same framework. And if a broad category of issues pertaining to gender equity can redound to the Democrats' political advantage—as Clinton's appearance at the event suggests—then Obamacare can, too.

As Matt Yglesias observed at Vox last week, in our political discourse, we tend to lump all "women's issues" together into the same category as culture war flashpoints like abortion. But for public opinion purposes, this is a big mistake. In truth, the politics of things like childcare and wage equality cut very differently than the "social" issues we associate them with, and that's at least in part because they alter the distribution of income. Higher wages, family leave, subsidized childcare—all of these increase women's income, and, thus, their economic power.

That helps explain why they're winning political issues. Transfer payments and "big government" aren't exactly in vogue right now, but gender equity is very popular. And the key is that Obamacare doesn't stand apart from these issues in any way.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Whether you like Obamacare or you hate it, chances are you don't think of it as a heavily gendered initiative, like equal pay. But though the debate over Obamacare centers around nominally gender-neutral values—should the government guarantee coverage, and are the benefits too generous?—the law operates as a substantial income transfer from men to women. For the past few years, this aspect of the law has given rise to rancorous debates over contraception and maternity care. But the contraception and maternity care guarantees are both manifestations of the fact that the law prohibits gender rating. Women consume more health care than men. This is in large part by accident of the fact that men don't get pregnant and give birth. Before Obamacare, insurers sorted that out by charging women higher premiums than men. Women were therefore less likely to be able to afford insurance on the individual market than men, more financially dependent on their employers for insurance than men, and thus faced greater tensions between their familial and professional ambitions than men. Obamacare doesn't end these inequalities, obviously, but it seeks to curb them. As a result, employers and spouses are less able to interfere in women's professional and reproductive decision making.

The similarities to, say, universal child care, are clear. Remove that cost, and women gain bargaining power in both the home and the workplace. On a cleaner political level, it helps free women from a socially imposed choice between childcare and professional advancement.

This may have sunk in to some extent already. In polling, Obamacare fares noticeably worse with men than with women.

Variety: "Hollywood 'Ready for Hillary' at Political Fundraiser"

By Ted Johnson

September 22, 2014, 1:16 p.m. PDT

Burt Bacharach sang "Alfie" and Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) talked of the urgency of keeping the Senate this year from Republican Mitch McConnell's leadership.

But the several dozen industry figures and Los Angeles politicos who attended a political fundraiser on Sunday had a singleness of purpose: to elect Hillary Clinton as the next president.

She wasn't there, she hasn't announced, and officially has nothing to do with Ready for Hillary, an independent expenditure committee set up last year.

But the Ready for Hillary event on Sunday at the Pacific Palisades home of "Homeland" executive producer Howard Gordon and his wife Cami was a preview of what attendees hope is to come: heavy and widespread Hollywood support for her presidential bid. Gordon was co-chair along with "Glee" and "American Horror Story" executive producer Ryan Murphy and his husband David Miller.

According to sources who were there, Boxer said that she didn't have any inside knowledge of whether Clinton would run but said it was "looking good."

She also expressed doubts that Democrats would be faced with the kind of split loyalties that they were in 2008 when Clinton and Barack Obama carried their nomination fight to the end of the primary season. In Hollywood, it created sometimes bitter divisions as both campaigns jockeyed for money and endorsements.

Ready for Hillary is setting up a grassroots infrastructure of supporters and a campaign-like operation in anticipation of a run — what supporters hope will clear the way for Clinton and avoid a repeat of the divisions of 2008. The political action committee has raised more than $8 million as of the end of June and, according to the Washington Post, its national finance counsel includes Gordon and producer Marcy Carsey.

A trio of singers did a medley of Bacharach standards, and, as he played piano, he joined them in singing among his most famous songs, “Raindrops Keep Fallin’ On My Head,” another collaboration with lyricist Hal David, “Alfie.”

Also at the event: Los Angeles City Controller Ron Galperin, Fox’s Dana Walden and producer Gail Berman, as well as Sim Farar, national finance chair for her campaign in 2008; Michael Trujillo, senior adviser to Ready for Hillary and David Wolf, its L.A. finance consultant.

Tickets were $1,000 per person, or $2,500 for a VIP reception.

Washington Free Beacon: “WFB’s Alana Goodman and Ellison Barber Discuss The Hillary-Alinsky Letters”

[No Writer Mentioned]

September 22, 2014, 8:30 p.m. EDT

Washington Free Beacon staff writers Alana Goodman and Ellison Barber appeared on The Blaze TV to discuss Goodman’s recent article revealing correspondence between Hillary Clinton and left-wing political activist Saul Alinsky in the early 1970s.

“We already knew that Hillary Clinton had some sort of relationship with Saul Alinsky, she wrote her Wellsley College thesis on him in 1969, but we didn’t really know the extent of it,” Goodman said. “These letters show that they clearly were pretty close, they had a friendship.”

Goodman said that because Alinsky remains a controversial figure in American history, particularly due to his role in the labor movement and community organizing in Chicago, an examination of his role in influencing Clinton’s ideology during the formative years of her political career remains relevant.

“I think that there is kind of this idea among many of the people in the media that Hillary Clinton’s past has just been picked over, there’s nothing else there, in 2016 the real vetting that the media will have to do will take place against Republicans,” Goodman said. “But I think that the Free Beacon stories that we have done, our coverage of Hillary Clinton over the past year, has shown that she also has vetting that can be done of her background as well, and there’s new information that could come to light.”

Bloomberg View: Jonathan Bernstein: “Radical Smear Won't Stick to Hillary”

By Jonathan Bernstein

September 22, 2014, 4:16 p.m. EDT

Over the weekend, the Washington Free Beacon ran a story about Hillary Clinton’s long-ago correspondence with the community organizer Saul Alinsky. Yes, after wasting years attempting to convince voters that Barack Obama was disqualified from the presidency because of his association with that New Left radical (and others), Republicans now seem to be trying to do the same to Clinton. Jonathan Chait points out the obvious: Clinton has decades of experience in public office and political action, which are far more likely to tell us her “real” thoughts and character than anything she did 40 years ago.

Three additional comments:

In the discussion about Matt Bai's contention that Gary Hart would have won the presidency in 1988 had it not been for a "gotcha" media unearthing an affair (see good new pieces from Dan Drezner and Ramesh Ponnuru), a few people observed that Hart would have done better than the Democratic nominee, Michael Dukakis, because the Massachusetts governor was vulnerable to attacks tying him to the disastrous furlough of convicted murderer Willie Horton and condemning his veto of a state bill requiring teachers to lead students in the Pledge of Allegiance. But George H.W. Bush's campaign probably would have come up with something against any potential challenger. In 1992, for example, Bush and Republicans maligned Bill Clinton by alleging that there was something suspicious about a trip he took to Moscow as a young man. Candidates who are inclined to use smears (and Bush, whatever his strengths as a president, had the campaign ethics of Tom Zarek) will use them, and there's no target pure enough to be immune.

I agree with Chait that it's silly to pretend that any politician would keep their real intentions secret until he or she reached the Oval Office. But even if they did, it wouldn't matter much, because we're well into what political scientist Richard Skinner described as the era of "partisan presidency." When a party is essentially united on policy, as Democrats are now, policy isn't what's at stake in choosing among candidates. And a president who attempted to govern based on a secret agenda would be severely constrained by his party outside -- and even inside -- the White House. For example, like Obama and George W. Bush, the next president will probably have a chief of staff with a long history within the party, but only limited experience with the president himself.

In any case, presidential-campaign smears are usually a waste of time. Obama won, as did Bill Clinton. People remember the smears against Dukakis or the later attacks on John Kerry's war record because of an Iron Law of Politics: The losing candidate is always thought to have run a bad campaign. Republicans today are united in believing that Mitt Romney did a poor job managing his race. Even so, presidential general elections are such high-visibility, high-information contests that campaigns probably matter less than in any other type of election. A major gaffe really can matter in a Senate race (see Todd Akin and his foolish comments on rape and reproduction in 2012), because the misstep might be all that inattentive voters retain about the candidate. That can't happen in presidential general elections, in which whatever is news in August will have been superceded dozens of times by November. In reality, neither the campaign successes or failures usually matter much, and to the extent they do. we rapidly forget the losing candidates successes and the winning candidate's failures.

Boston Herald: "Ditch 2016 Elizabeth Warren for prez bid, local Dems ask"

By Hillary Chabot

Local Democratic party boosters of U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren told a frenzied group of progressives to ditch their bid to draft her as a 2016 presidential nominee, saying the push undercuts her vow to stay put as a Massachusetts lawmaker.

"I think these people are very enthusiastic about Elizabeth Warren's positions on issues and they want her to play an increasing role in national politics, but she has made it pretty clear to Massachusetts voters that she intends to remain in the Senate," said Philip W. Johnston, former chairman of the Massachusetts Democratic Party, who was an early backer when Warren considered running for Senate in 2011.

Johnston's comments came after a Herald front-page story yesterday revealed nearly a year's worth of emails by an ultraliberal group called "Gamechanger Salon," which show how their "Ready for Warren" campaign is trying to emulate GOP Tea Party election successes.

"It's wonderful that they are supportive," Johnston added. "But I think Elizabeth Warren understands who she is and what she thinks, and I don't think she'll be influenced by outside groups."

Other members in the email chain worried that the draft movement might hurt Warren.

"This kind of thing does make me very nervous," Mike Lux, a Democratic consultant wrote last year as the draft effort revved up.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Elizabeth is working very hard to be an effective Senator, and if there is a big draft effort, a lot of people will assume, fair or not, that she is encouraging it," Lux added.

The email thread — which ordered members not to share its contents with the press — makes it clear that Warren's emergence was a happy accident and that the collaborators were searching for a progressive to run against the presumed front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton.

"A thought here — the goal is to send a message: We want a progressive to lead the ticket in 2016. But when we get into "draft XX" movements we run into problems," wrote Richard Eskow, a radio personality who works in the progressive action group "Campaign for America's Future."

Johnston said while the progressives are a distraction for Warren, he believes they are doing a good job keeping Clinton on her toes and potentially influencing her campaign policies.

Said Johnston: "I think they should pay heed to (Warren's) success."

Bush Opens New Front in Attack on Clinton's Foreign Policy Record

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb Bush at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library in Simi Valley, Calif., on Tuesday. Mario Anzuoni/Reuters

By Amy Chozick

Good Wednesday morning from what scientists now say is a dying universe and where Donald J. Trump remains the leader in Republican polls. But while he dabbled in policy discussions and held a large rally in Michigan on Tuesday, one of his major rivals, Jeb Bush*, regained some of the spotlight by attacking* Hillary Rodham Clinton over the Obama administration's policies in the Middle East.

Republican attacks on Mrs. Clinton's lucrative speeches and her comment that she was "dead broke" seem quaint compared with linking her to the violence, beheadings and instability sweeping the Middle East.

On Tuesday, Mr. Bush ushered in a new phase of the campaign, where Mrs. Clinton's record at the State Department will face intense scrutiny for the rise of the Islamic State and the violence engulfing Syria and Iraq.

In a speech at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library in Simi Valley, Calif., Mr. Bush said Mrs. Clinton "stood by" as secretary of state as the situation in Iraq worsened and the Obama administration pulled troops out, a vacuum that he said the Islamic State had rushed in to fill.

The Clinton campaign, in turn, cast the blame further back, saying that President George W. Bush's decision to invade Iraq in the first place created the group. "ISIS grew out of Al Qaeda in Iraq," said Jake Sullivan, the Clinton campaign's senior policy adviser, "It emerged in no small part as a result of President Bush's failed strategy."

Mrs. Clinton, whose vote to authorize the war in Iraq hurt her in the 2008

Democratic nominating contest, hardly talks about foreign policy or her time at the State Department. Instead, she devotes her town-hall-style events and speeches to policy areas like the economy, the environment and her new college affordability plan.

But as Mr. Bush made clear on Tuesday, Republicans will press the issue with Mrs. Clinton on foreign policy and over the Obama administration's approach — whether over the spread of the Islamic State, the "reset" of relations with Russia or the nuclear deal with Iran.

What We're Watching Today

- Mr. Bush, whose campaign this summer unsuccessfully pushed for Nevada to switch from a caucus system to a primary and who recently chose leaders to run campaign operations in all of the state's counties, will hold a rally in Reno and a town-hall-style event in Las Vegas later in the day.

- And Rick Santorum, who won the Iowa caucuses in 2012 , but whose poll numbers left him out of the top 10 for last week's Republican debate, continues a sustained trip in the state, all part of his goal, his campaign says, "to reach all 99 Iowa counties."

Carson to Take Personal Narrative to a Harlem Institution

After a quiet but relatively well-received performance at the debate, Ben Carson is headed to Harlem.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Carson will speak with Harlem residents on Wednesday at Sylvia's Restaurant, well known for its Southern comfort food, where photos of President Obama, former President Bill Clinton, the Rev. Al Sharpton and Representative Charles B. Rangel, all Democrats, hang on the walls.

"This is a private event," said a woman who answered the phone at Sylvia's. "They called us up and booked the private area," she added, before emphasizing that hosting the event did not represent an endorsement.

On Sunday, Mr. Carson, a retired neurosurgeon whose best moment in the debate came when he said he was the only candidate who had separated conjoined twins, visited a church in Iowa where he spoke about his faith.

He told the congregation of growing up poor in Detroit, how much he hated it and of how he found God in trying to deal with his temper. Despite his lengthy medical résumé, he has not held public office and has relied heavily on his personal narrative.

"Dr. Carson is not here to campaign," the church's pastor said, according to The Des Moines Register. "We're not saying go vote for Dr. Carson. We're saying here's a man who walks humbly before his God, who has an incredible message not only for us but for our country."

The Sylvia's event is another chance for him to introduce himself to voters. And Harlem, home to the country's first black renaissance, may also offer a stage to discuss the Black Lives Matter movement, a subject Mr. Carson, the only black candidate in either party, has touched on only briefly.

"He is not here to make statements," a spokeswoman, Deana Bass, said. "This is a meet and greet for him to visit the restaurant and chat with residents. It is nothing extra."

Kasich Thanks Trump for Drawing Debate Crowds

Gov. John R. Kasich of Ohio came to a Peterborough, N.H., event on Tuesday with a take-the-high-road answer prepared for questions about Mr. Trump.

"I don't have time to talk about somebody else," Mr. Kasich said, adding that he was fully occupied, like Mr. Carson, with introducing himself to voters.

Responding to a question from a voter about how he had similarly deflected the topic of Mr. Trump in a CNN interview, Mr. Kasich even avoided mentioning the unlikely Republican poll-leader by name.

For a while, that is.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He eventually gave in to temptation, after uncorking a metaphor about how his much-praised debate performance was akin to being an astronaut launched in a rocket ship.

"Thank God for Donald Trump; 24 million people tuned in," Mr. Kasich said, drawing knowing laughs about the Trump-inflated audience.

Our Favorites From The Times

- Senator Marco Rubio of Florida's presidential campaign so far has been a lot of fits and starts: It impresses; it raises expectations; then it goes quiet. And it's all part of the plan.

- Responding to a New York Times Magazine article on efforts to undermine the 1965 Voting Rights Act, Mr. Obama wrote a letter to the editor, arguing that voting rights must be "vigorously defended" and calling on Congress to restore the law in the wake of a Supreme Court ruling that invalidated crucial parts of it.

- Mrs. Clinton has directed aides to give an email server and a thumb drive to the Justice Department as the inspector general for the intelligence community told members of Congress that two of the former secretary of state's emails among the 40 he has reviewed held classified information.

- And if there is a war between Mr. Trump and Fox News, it is an unconventional one. It is not mutually assured destruction; it is mutually beneficial combat.

What We're Reading Elsewhere

- Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont continues to both draw the kind of large crowds that other candidates dream of, and to gain ground on Mrs. Clinton in polls. The Washington Post and The Los Angeles Times take a look at his success.

- Politico reports that Senator Chuck Schumer of New York, who is the highest-ranking Democrat to come out against the Iran nuclear deal, and is expected to be among the lead contenders to take over the party's Senate leadership when Senator Harry Reid of Nevada steps down, has been "working the phones" to explain his decision and to assure Democrats that he will not try to secure more no votes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- And Mr. Bush's Middle East policy attacks against Mrs. Clinton, Slate argues, will put her in the position of having to choose between defending herself and criticizing Mr. Obama during the Democratic contest.

- Mr. Trump may have a lot of money, but he is refusing to spend it on his campaign, like by buying television ads, spending on ballot access, or paying for campaign rallies, The Wall Street Journal reports.

- The fact that former Gov. Rick Perry of Texas, Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky, and Mr. Santorum are continuing their campaigns despite fund-raising woes shows how "super PACs" can keep failing campaigns alive , Politico reports.

Crowds Overflowing, Cruz Makes a 1965 Ford Pickup His Stage

Connie's Fried Chicken in Tupelo, Miss., has a small dining area, maybe enough to seat 30 or 40. Hundreds of people R.S.V.P.'d to Senator Ted Cruz of Texas' "Down Home Breakfast" event here on Tuesday.

So the owner called up Scott Hendrix, a local classic car enthusiast who owns 15 historical automobiles, at least "one in each decade," and asked him to park his 1965 Ford F-250 flatbed pickup truck outside, so that Mr. Cruz would have a new stage.

Mr. Hendrix was happy to oblige, as both a Republican and a friend of the owner, but he didn't know Mr. Cruz too well. After the speech, however, his tone shifted.

"I was happy to have done it for him, but I didn't start out to do it that way," Mr. Hendrix said. But now "I really like what he has to say."

Mr. Hendrix's cars are his life's passion; he remembers putting his piggy bank savings into a rumble seat of the first classic car he bought with his father: a 1930 Ford Model A Roadster.

"For all of $21, I owned the back seat of that car," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If Mr. Cruz returned to Mississippi , and was in need of a classic car again, say the Roadster or any other of his fleet, could he turn to Mr. Hendrix?

“Absolutely,” he said.

Dear Barbara,

I just talked with Corinne Goldstein, one of our firm's top sanctions experts, and she said that she and several other of our sanctions attorneys cannot find any reference to the 5 year/8 year extension of the conventional weapons/missile ban in the Agreement or annexes, although the President again mentioned it today, stating that he got more from Iran since the lifting of UN sanctions would automatically lift this ban. Corinne said that the agreement simply indicates that once a new UNSC resolution is passed, the ban terminates period.

If the Administration cannot pinpoint a part of the agreement that refers to this, it could cause a problem with Congress.

Best wishes,

Stu

Subject: task force statement appreciate quick edit of this so i can send out to others:

The Iran Task Force of the Atlantic Council has worked for XXX years on Iran-related issues, from internal political developments to the impact of sanctions on the Iranian economy, and with a special focus on the challenges raised by Iran's nuclear program. We have held XXX seminars and conferences with a wide-range of experts on every aspect of Iranian society and policy, and published XXX reports. We have put out statements on the progress of past negotiations, including the April 2015 interim agreement.

We believe it is critical to view the Agreement announced in Vienna in a clear-eyed, realistic perspective, in which we may wish for the best outcome--full Iranian compliance with its terms; Iran turning away from a desire to acquire a nuclear weapon, not just during the term of the Agreement, but after its expiration; the channeling of the huge sums that will come to Iran with the lifting of US, EU, and UN sanctions for internal development and the betterment of its citizens, not for further support for terrorism; that its conduct will moderate as its economic isolation is ended and western investment takes hold-- but to be prepared for the worst scenario, which is at least as likely, if not more so--Iranian cheating on its explicit terms and obstructing the IAEA inspections necessary to verify the Agreement; the difficulty of sanctions "snapping-back" if there are violations; a patient willingness to wait until the expiration of the Agreement and then to rush headlong into a nuclear weapons program; the use of some of the funds obtained from the lifting of sanctions for even more aggressive support for the terrorist groups who look to it for leadership, from Hezbollah and Hamas to the radical Shiite militias in Iraq and Yemen, and to further support the Iranian support for the Assad regime in Syria; that its revolutionary zeal will not be curbed, but enhanced with new revenues; and that Iran will be left, with all the restrictions in the Agreement as a nuclear threshold state; the arms embargo on conventional weapons and missiles will be ended in five and eight years, respectively.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We believe it is likewise critical that the US government recognize and take actions to deal with the signficant opposition to this Agreement from our closest Arab allies in the Middle East and from Israel, which views an Iranian nuclear weapon as an existential threat to its existence. The US government must act urgently to assure that this Agreement does not ignite a new nuclear arms race in the volatile Middle East.

We come to the conclusion, even in a worst or most likely a mixed case scenario, that this Agreement is better than the alternatives if the Agreement is rejected. We would be left with only a military option, which may be necessary if Iran actually marches forward for a nuclear weapon, but would be difficult to justify after Iran has agreed to signficant curbs on its nuclear appetite. We believe that additional sanctions are not likely to produce a significantly improved Agreement. The reason is that we already have the most extensive, comprehensive sanctions ever exacted against a country in peacetime, and there are few others available to the US. Moreover, it is highly doubtful the EU, whose cooperation in imposing sanctions has been critical to getting Iran to seriously negotiate and make the signficant compromises embodied in the Vienna Agreement, would support additional sanctions. Even during the sanctions period, Iran continued to increase the number of centrifuges, to work on more advanced centrifuges, and to begin a plutonium facility at Arak.

Most significant, with no agreement, there would no significant reduction in its 19,000 centrifuges; no dismantlement of its Arak plutonium plant; no intrusive IAEA inspections; no elongation of its breakout period from several months to a year.

The Atlantic Council's Iran Task Force believes the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Acti on (JCPOA), if faithfully implemented, will restrict Iran's nuclear program for at l east a decade in return for sanctions relief. While substantial differences remain b etween the United States and Iran, preventing Iran from developing nuclear weapons f or a prolonged period eases concerns about the most alarming aspect of Iranian polic y and could contribute to a desperately needed easing of tensions in the region.

There are important curbs on Iran's nuclear ambitions:

--The number of operating centrifuges at its Natanz facility will be reduced from 95 00 to 5060 for 10 years;

--Iran will limits enrichment to 3.7%, far below weapons grade (90%) and below the 2 0% level to which it has enriched some of its uranium.

--Iran's stockpile of low-enriched uranium will be cut from 10,000 kilograms to 300 kilograms, less than needed for one nuclear bomb for 15 years, a reduction of 98%;

--For a period of 25 years there will be extensive monitoring by the IAEA on the sup ply chain of Iran's nuclear program, from mining and milling of uranium, all the way to the enrichment of uranium hexafluoride (UF6), and the IAEA will have the right t o continuous surveillance of centrifuge manufacturing and storage facilities);

--The core of the heavy-water reactor at Arak will be removed, precluding its produc tion of weapons grade plutonium (Pu-239), which is the most efficient fuel to make a nuclear weapon, and reprocessing will be prohibited, and its spent fuel will be sen t out of Iran, and it will not build another heavy-water plant for 15 years;

--Iran will transform its deeply buried facility at Fordo into a center for science research;

--Although Iran has long-since signed the Additional Protocol of the Nuclear Non-Pro liferation Treaty, it will now be obligated to implement this, and to permit intrusi ve inspections by the IAEA of its civilian and military facilities "anywhere in the country". Many of the inspection provisions will last for 20 or 25 years, and some p ermanently, making it more difficult to develop a nuclear weapon.

--Only the support of five of eight countries could find a violation by Iran that wo uld lead to snap-back sanctions, meaning that Russia, China and Iran together could not block their reimposition if there is a violation of the terms of the Agreement b y Iran.

--The lifting of sanctions, which Iran had wanted to occur immediately upon signing, will come only when the IAEA certifies that Iran has complied with the terms of the Agreement, likely by the end of 2015.

--The IAEA and Iran have entered into a separate agreement in which Iran will be req uired to answer the full 12 questions put to it regarding the Possible Military Dime nsions (PMDs) of their past nuclear program, including interviews of their scientist s and other nuclear officials, in order for the IAEA to make the positive certificat ion necessary for sanctions relief.

--There are restrictions for 15 years on Iran's development of advanced centrifuges, which can produced enriched fuel five to six times faster than the current models.

At the same time, there are significant shortcomings the Task Force sees, that will require a willingness by the US and its allies to call Iran to task if there are vio lations or refusals to cooperate:

--The IAEA cannot initiate inspections of undeclared nuclear sites anywhere-anytime, but must present evidence of why it wishes to have access to the sites, and Iran ha s up to 24 days before they must comply, giving it the time to "clean-up" any suspec t sites;

--The snap-back sanctions would not be able to capture commercial contracts which ha ve been entered into before the violations are discovered, which are grandfathered, thereby encouraging companies to enter into long-term contracts with Iran;

--The conventional arms embargo would be ended in five years, giving Iran additional capabilities to provide arms to its radical, anti-western surrogates; and eight yea rs for ballistic missiles, which would provide a delivery system for possible nuclea r weapon;

--It is inconceivable that Iran would not provide some of the $150 billion in frozen assets it will get after an IAEA certification, as early as the end of this year, t o its radical supporters, giving it the capacity to further destabilize the region.

The most troubling feature of the agreement, is that after 10 years, there are essen tially no limits on Iran's capacity to move rapidly to a nuclear weapon, shortening its breakout time for a nuclear weapon from a year, under the agreement, to a few mo nths, where it is now. It is this feature that is of the gravest concern to our alli es, and should be to the US. Even now, with the restrictions, Iran is a nuclear thre shold state.

Therefore, our Task Force would urge that the US make clear now to Iran that it is n o more acceptable for Iran to have a nuclear weapon after the expiration of a nuclea r weapon after the Agreement expires than now; that Iran understand in clear terms t hat the US will use all means necessary, including military force, to prevent it obt aining a nuclear weapon; that we provide additional security guarantees to our allie s in the region, including Israel, and the means to defend themselves.

Our allies in the region must also be assured that the US will not use this Agreemen t as a basis for agreements with Iran that threaten their security.

The Task Force also urges that the Administration work now with the EU to reach agre ement that targeted sanctions could be imposed if there are violations and if Iran i ncreases its funding of terrorist groups with the new funds it will obtain after san ctions are removed.

But the Task Force also believes that rejecting this Agreement will produce the wors t of all possible worlds: the EU will almost certainly abandon its sanctions; the re ductions in Iran's nuclear program may not be realized, and he IAEA inspections will be curtailed or eliminated.

Dear Barbara,

Please do a "deep dive" into the Agreement, with the pluses and minuses (gaps), so we are ready with a response.
I have a client meeting tomorrow from 9:30 am to 11:30 am in Arlington. Can we move the Task Force meeting later in the day?

Subject:	Clinton Foundation Update: Latin America Trip

Hi everyone – we wanted to give you some updates on our trip to Latin America this week.

President Clinton got a firsthand look at the work of the Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership (CGEP) and CGI commitment-makers in El Salvador, Panama, and Peru.

The Clinton Foundation, through CGEP, is working to develop social enterprises that foster sustainable economic development aimed at helping people work themselves out of poverty, with a focus on increasing opportunities for girls and women. In Latin America, this includes equipping women with sales and skills training and a basket of fortified food and consumer products, which the entrepreneurs then sell to others within their communities – providing essential, life-changing goods and helping to increase household incomes. CGEP also works to empower smallholder farmers by giving them better access to markets and infrastructural improvements for their locally grown produce.

So our friends could follow us along on the trip, President Clinton "took over" the Clinton Foundation's Instagram account , posting pictures of what he saw and who he met. See below for some of those moments.

INCREASING FARMERS' INCOMES IN EL SALVADOR

In El Salvador, President Clinton learned about CGEP's Accesso Oferta program , which purchases fruits and vegetables from small-scale farmers at favorable payment terms, provides essential training in good agricultural practices, and ensures farmers have access to quality seeds and fertilizers that will significantly improve the quality and yields of the produce they grow. During the visit, President Clinton met Lillian Pacheco and Edgar Lemus, two farmers who have benefited from the program. Lillian's income has increased from $200 per month to $900 and Edgar's from $350 per month to $1,100.

GENERATING CLEAN, RENEWABLE ENERGY IN PANAMA

President Clinton then headed to Panama, where he visited the Coclé Windfarm, part of the CGI Commitment to Action "Million Investment in Latin America's Renewable Energy." President Clinton and partners toured the wind farm, hearing about its construction, the environmental benefits it offers, and the cost savings associated with the recently introduced renewable energy.

Empowering women entrepreneurs in Peru

The tour's last stop took President Clinton to Lima, Peru. In the morning, he visited a depot that houses a fleet of buses running of compressed natural gas, helping the city reduce carbon emissions. This work is a result of a partnership between C40, the Clinton Climate Initiative, and the City of Lima. Clinton Foundation Chair Bruce Lindsey signed a Letter of Intent to relaunch C40's work in Lima.

In the afternoon, President Clinton met with women entrepreneurs that participate in CGEP's Chakipi Acceso program, a last-mile distribution enterprise that equips women in various regions in Peru with sales skills training and essential products, which the entrepreneurs then sell to others within their communities – providing essential, life-changing goods that are otherwise hard or impossible to access. President Clinton learned about how the entrepreneurs select their products, observed onsite product training, and heard from several women in the program about how the project has benefitted their families and improved their incomes.

The Hill: “Clinton message taking shape”

By Alexandra Jaffe and Amie Parnes

July 23, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton is sharpening her message months ahead of a likely bid for the White House.

After a rocky first few months back in the spotlight where she struggled to offer crisp sound bites, Clinton is now test-driving various campaign themes.

The former New York senator is signaling that this time around — unlike in 2008 — she will offer a concise and cohesive vision for the country.

On Monday, she said during a Facebook question-and-answer session, “The next president should work to grow the economy, increase upward mobility, and decrease inequality.”

That statement taps into key Democratic rallying points that appeal to independents as well as the liberal base pining for a potential Elizabeth Warren candidacy. She hasn’t offered much policy details, but there’s plenty of time for that.

“We’ve reached a point in our life when we think you really shouldn’t run for office if you don’t have a clear idea of what you can do and a unique contribution you can make and you can outline that,” former President Bill Clinton told CNN this week. “Now that the book [tour] is done, she wants time to think about that and work through it. I think so much of politics is background noise, and we don’t need the background noise anymore.”

But as necessary as it is for the former first lady to come up with a simple message — the lack of which, Clinton allies say, was perhaps a fatal flaw of her 2008 campaign — it’s also a difficult task. In essence, Clinton needs her own “hope and change” theme.

Clinton allies say one is emerging.

“Hillary Clinton has made it clear that should she run for president, her forward-thinking agenda will be reflective of her life’s work — leveling the playing field and giving everyone a chance to succeed,” said Adrienne Watson, a spokeswoman for Correct the Record, a pro-Clinton super-PAC. “She said very clearly, just this month, that the current disparity must be fixed so that hard work is rewarded and our system works for everyone.”

The current themes are emerging after Clinton and her inner circle pieced together the missteps of the 2008 bid. A Democratic strategist said one of the biggest reasons Clinton lost to President Obama is because she didn’t demonstrate that she had a clear path for moving the country forward. Clinton, the operative said, acted as though she was the inevitable nominee.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“At every campaign stop you heard Obama say, ‘I want to see the country do x, y and z and that’s why I’m running for president of the United States of America.’ She failed to do that. She relied too much on the sentiment that she was the best person for the job without really explaining why.”

In her book, Hard Choices, the former secretary of State wrote that potential presidential candidates should consider it their responsibility to “renew the American Dream.”

“Having lost in 2008, I know that nothing is guaranteed, nothing can be taken for granted. I also know that the most important questions anyone considering running must answer are not ‘Do you want to be President?’ or ‘Can you win?’” she wrote. “They are, ‘What’s your vision for America?’ And ‘Can you lead us there?’”

Clinton announced her 2008 campaign by proclaiming, “I’m in, and I’m in to win.”

It’s a challenge for Clinton to craft a fresh vision because her campaign will operate in the shadow of her husband’s presidency. She will be asked to answer what went well and what went wrong over those eight years.

Speaking to talk show host Charlie Rose on PBS last week, Clinton offered the outlines of a potential campaign rationale.

“You have to run a very specific campaign that talks about the changes you want to make in order to tackle growth, which is the hand maiden of inequality,” she said.

She offered her husband’s economic policies as an example of what would work to reduce inequality, and implicitly knocked Republican economic theories, a hint at where her own platform would end up.

“We still have people in positions of political leadership who argue that trickle-down economics, supply side economics work. There is no convincing evidence of that,” she said. “So what you need if you’re going to run for president or run for any important position is to be absolutely clear about what you will do and to make the case relentlessly about that.”

A former senior aide to Clinton on her 2008 campaign dismissed concerns that she would be weighed down by her husband’s record, arguing she can easily distance herself from other policies by simply saying, “We live in a different world.”

The ex-staffer said Clinton’s vision will also look “completely different” from 2008 because “we’re not in the same place.”

“We were at war and voter polling indicated that people were still legitimately concerned with terrorism. That’s reality one. And reality two is that we won’t have someone like Mark Penn who came in and messed everything up with bad messaging,” the aide added. Penn was a senior strategist for Clinton’s 2008 campaign.

Skepticism from the progressive base is a 2008 issue that Clinton will have to address head on. Calls from the left for Warren (D) to run in 2016 have grown ever louder as the freshman senator from Massachusetts has been hitting the trail for Democratic candidates this cycle and revving up the base with fiery, populist rhetoric.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton faces the challenge, said Mike Lux, a former Clinton White House aide, of deciding “strategically, politically, policy wise, how much distance to try to create between her and Wall Street,” which has traditionally been a strong backer of the Clintons.

“I think good politicians — and I think Hillary is a good politician — are good at threading needles, and I think there’s probably a way to do it. But the danger when you’re trying to thread a needle is that you poke both sides, because you try to play it both ways,” Lux said.

Lux added she might ultimately have to apologize for supporting some policies, such as the deregulation of the banks that contributed to the financial crisis, that have given progressives pause.

But a former Hillary Clinton aide said if she runs, she would make a credible case on reducing inequality.

“The totality of her record is very much about equality and fairness,” the ex-staffer said.

A former Obama 2008 campaign aide said Clinton would pummel Warren, who has repeatedly said she’s not running.

“Hillary has more than redeemed herself with many through her services as secretary of State,” the former Obama campaign aide said. “Her leadership skills as an executive are hardly in dispute now.”

The ex-Obama staffer added, “Clinton has done so much more to co-opt the base groups in the past eight years. Yes, Warren will be the left-of-center darling, but I think she’s going to be outgunned by every metric.

“I also think that the left-wing base have grown up a little,” the former Obama aide continued. “They realize that the shiny new object can only do so much in a polarized, gridlocked capital.”

Huffington Post opinion: Allida Black: “Blazing a Trail: Hillary Clinton, Advocate for Children and the Indigent”

By Allida Black

July 22, 2014, 7:08 p.m. EDT

If we are going to have a discussion about Hillary Clinton's legal career, then let's be sure the whole story is told - one that explains both her commitment and her pioneering advocacy for abused children and the indigent in need of counsel.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To tell this story, you need to return to the mid-1970s, when the nation had no common legal standard for abused and neglected children, the poor had little access to legal counsel, rape was concealed rather than prosecuted, and the nation, especially the South, offered few services to those survived the horror of rape.

Hillary Rodham started law school in the fall of 1969. Child abuse was seen as family matter and was swept under the rug; and children had few protections under the law. A few bold lawyers tackled this and Hillary, the law student, stood with them.

Soon Hillary was at the forefront of legal campaigns to protect children and represent those too poor to pay a lawyer. She helped shape legal aid clinics, researched child abuse and neglect, and represented those who had been assaulted or abused. As she wrote in Living History, her work on behalf of abuse victims "went hand-in-hand with my assignments at the New Haven Legal Services office," as both stemmed from her realization "that what I wanted to do with the law was to give a voice to [those] who were not being heard."

The legal aid system was haphazard and undefined. Even though the 6th Amendment granted criminal defendants in federal cases the right "to have the assistance of counsel," it took until the 1930s for indigent defendants in federal cases to secure counsel, and another 30 years for the Supreme Court to apply that right to indigents charged in state felony cases. Even then the Court left many key questions about legal aid unanswered. The demand for legal aid lawyers swamped existing legal pools.

Hillary spent her years after law school tackling both these challenges. In 1973, she went to work at the newly formed Children's Defense Fund, the country's leading child advocacy organization. After moving to Fayetteville, Arkansas, in 1974, she taught criminal procedure at the law school and ran its legal aid clinic.

In early 1975, Hillary was appointed by a judge to represent an indigent man charged with rape. Hillary wrestled with the assignment, especially since a young child was involved. She asked to be removed from the case, but the court denied her request.

I can only speculate on the gut-wrenching torment this must have given Hillary.

She found herself torn between the two legal values she cherished. But in the end, she could not discount that her values and professional ethics mandated that all indigent defendants, not just those accused of nonviolent crimes, receive adequate counsel.

But the record is clear how Hillary responded as soon as the trial ended. She helped launch the first rape crisis hotline in Arkansas and strove to give women the medical, legal, and social support they needed. This was a bold act. Rape Crisis Centers and hotlines were rare. Indeed, crisis centers in Washington, D.C. and Boston had only opened their doors in 1972 and 1973. In the South, only Memphis and Athens, Georgia followed suit.

It wasn't long after that I first learned about Hillary. In 1975, I helped start the first rape crisis center in Atlanta. I was trying to navigate the legal issues related to child assault victims, but the law was so new, I was lost, so I asked for help. Everywhere I called, the experts would say, "Do you know Hillary Rodham? She's who you need to talk to."

Less than four years after graduation, Hillary had already established herself as one of the country's leading advocates for abused and neglected children. Her groundbreaking articles in the Harvard Educational Review and Yale Law Review spurred urgently-needed legal reforms. While at home, her leadership of Arkansas Advocates for Children and Families gave voice to abused and neglected children.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The same can be said for Hillary's cutting edge work to expand legal aid. As manager of the Fayetteville legal aid clinic, she saw how the legal standard used to determine whether a defendant qualified for aid was "an impossible standard to meet" and she "wanted to change the law."

And indeed she did. In 1977, President Carter appointed Hillary to the Legal Services Corporation, a federal program charged with expanding access to legal aid. Hillary was the first woman to chair the corporation, and under her leadership, funding more than tripled from $90 million to $300 million.

Hillary's early leadership in these two fundamental civic values is often overshadowed by her other political and diplomatic successes. It should not be. It shows us who she is, why she took the actions she did, and how she will continue to lead.

KPCC-FM (C.A.): "Hillary Clinton on Gaza, 'Hard Choices' and being called a '20th century candidate'"

By AirTalk

July 22, 2014, 10:38 a.m. EDT

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton responded on Tuesday to charges from Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) that she is a "20th century candidate" by defending the Obama administration's first term and saying that "every election is about the future."

On Morning Edition Tuesday, Rubio said:

"I think she's extremely vulnerable on her record. The truth of the matter is she was the Secretary of State during an administration that has had virtually no major successes on foreign policy. In fact, their failures on foreign policy are stark, and we'll remind them of them every single day, and she'll have to answer for that. And the other is I think she's just a 20th century candidate."

Clinton is currently touring the U.S. promoting her new memoir "Hard Choices," in which she writes about the four years she served as the nation's top diplomat under President Barack Obama. We were lucky enough to snag some time with her to discuss a number of issues, including Rubio's comments on her potential candidacy.

On Rubio's '20th century candidate' remark:

"I wrote a whole book called 'Hard Choices' that details a lot of the important successes of the first term of President Obama (and maybe I should send a copy of it to my Republican friends). Secondly, elections are about differences, as we know, but every election is about the future and certainly anyone who wishes to run for president has to make it clear how the experience that you've had in the past and what you believe and how you have acted on those beliefs will translate into positive results for the American people.

"I will be standing up and speaking out in favor of the changes that I think we need to make to improve life for middle-class Americans, to give every kid a chance to go to college without being bankrupted and disabled by student debt, to try and resolve our immigration challenges in a way that is keeping with our values, and so much else. I know that elections are about the future and I look forward in engaging in that kind of debate."

On whether she'll run for president:

"We have an election this November, which is a pretty consequential one, because it'll determine the control of the Senate, and obviously I strongly am committed to doing what I can to keep the Senate in Democratic hands. And so I think we all should be focused on that election and not look ahead to 2016. But by the end of the year, or early next year, people will start making decisions, and of course, I will be among them...

"You certainly have to make the decision, when and how you go pubic with it, that's up to each individual, but from my perspective, I think it's incredibly important that we stay focused on these midterm elections — that historically have a lower turnout than presidential elections — because so much is at stake. After we've done everything we can for the 2014 elections, the Democratic Party, the country, we can turn our attention to the upcoming presidential race."

On medical marijuana and federal enforcement:

"Honestly, I don't think we've done enough research yet to say what the effects are and what they could be on different people with different physical or psychological issues, different ages — yes, medical first and foremost, we ought to be doing more to make sure that we know how marijuana would interact with other prescription drugs and the like. But we also have to know how even medical marijuana impacts our kids and our communities.

But the states are the laboratories of democracy, and we're seeing states pass laws that enable their citizens to have access to medical marijuana under certain conditions, so we have the opportunity to try to study those. And then Colorado and Washington have proceeded to permit recreational use. And at the same time, we're seeing the beginnings of important criminal justice reforms.

So I'm a big believer in acquiring evidence, and I think we should see what kind of results we get, both from medical marijuana and from recreational marijuana before we make any far-reaching conclusions... I think the feds should be attuned to the way marijuana is still used as a gateway drug and how the drug cartels from Latin America use marijuana to get footholds in states, so there can't be a total absence of law enforcement, but what I want to see, and I think we should be much more focused on this, is really doing good research so we know what it is we're approving."

On teacher tenure and the Vergara decision:

"I haven't read the Vergara decision, so I don't know the details, but I would make just a few points. First, I think everybody should agree that good teachers are at the heart of high-quality learning, and we need more cooperative partnerships between innovative unions, especially at the local level, and with local school districts, with parents, with teachers, and not the adversarial approach that I think has not worked to the benefit of our kids. And we have to get back to what really does work for kids, because these education debates are really toxic.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Anything that stands truly in the way based on reliable evidence to the well-being and educational attainment of our most disadvantaged kids we should tackle systematically. But I think it's probably unwise to be making education decisions by judicial decision."

On the conflict in Israel and Gaza:

We obviously want to help bring an end to the conflict in Gaza, we also want to support Israel's right to self-defense. And we want to ensure that lethal rockets don't continue to make their way to Gaza under the control of Hamas. You may have heard that American airlines have just been ordered by the FAA not to fly into Ben Gurion Airport because a rocket just landed very close to Ben Gurion Airport. So that certainly is an issue that we have to be paying attention to.

Similarly, with Ukraine, when an unarmed civilian commercial airplane is shot down by insurgents who have been armed and equipped by Russia, that raises a lot of issues for anybody in America who is flying these days, so you have to look at all of this in a thoughtful way, and you have to meet high bars to do anything that might lead to anything with military support.

...I've been on the phone many times with Prime Minister Netanyahu. I have a whole chapter in my book about negotiating the November 2012 cease fire that prevented a ground invasion by the Israelis into Gaza, because at that time Hamas was firing rockets into Israel…I would certainly be urging that he try to accomplish the military objectives — which I have to say Larry, are legitimate ones: To destroy the tunnels that are providing pathways into Israel by armed Hamas fighters and destroy the stockpiles of rockets that are getting more accurate and raining down now on the entire territory of Israel — and I would say, 'Mr. Prime Minister, please move as carefully and expeditiously as is possible to finish the military objectives, because although you do have a right to protect your country, we want to do everything we can to limit, if not eliminate, civilian casualties... I would urge the prime minister to accept any additional offers of cease fire, because Israel should demonstrate its willingness to end the military conflict, but of course, Hamas should be required to do the same."

On the embassy attack in Benghazi:

"I took general responsibility immediately, because I was responsible for the State Department and the people there, but as I write in a very thorough chapter in my book, I am not a security expert. I would not pretend to be one… Obviously it was a tragic event, and I immediately put together an independent review board and they found that there were problems in the assessment of security requests in the department…

I think it's important for Americans to realize that our facilities around the world are often attacked. We had a terrible attack with Ronald Reagan was president — 258 Americans killed in Beirut. There were attacks when my husband was president. We lost 12 Americans and many Africans in attacks on our embassies in Kenya and Tanzania… It's a dangerous world out there and we do the best we can, but we don't retreat. We don't say, 'OK, it's a dangerous world, therefore we can't be out there, and we can't be picking up information, and we can't representing the United States.'"

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "Hillary Clinton responds to Rubio: 'Every election is about the future'"

By Sean Sullivan

July 22, 2014, 4:46 p.m. EDT

Former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton responded Tuesday to Sen. Marco Rubio's charge that she is a "20th century candidate," suggesting that all elections are about what's next.

"I know that elections are about the future, and I would look forward in engaging in that kind of debate," Clinton said in an interview with "Airtalk" on Southern California public radio station KPCC.

Clinton said that voters need to evaluate a candidate's record to determine how the candidate will behave in the future.

"Every election is about the future. And certainly anyone who wishes to run for president has to make it clear how the experience that you've had in the past and what you believe and how you have acted on those beliefs will translate into positive results for the American people," Clinton said. "And I will be standing up and speaking out in favor of the changes that I think we need to make."

Clinton sounded like a presidential candidate, vowing to take on issues like student loan debt, immigration and improving the lives of middle class Americans. But she reiterated that has not decided whether she will run in 2016.

Rubio (R-Fla.), who is also a potential candidate, suggested in an interview broadcast earlier in the day that Clinton does not offer a forward-looking platform.

"I just think she's a 20th century candidate," Rubio told NPR in an interview published Tuesday. "I think she does not offer an agenda for moving America forward in the 21st century -- at least not up to now."

Rubio also criticized President Obama's foreign policy, insisting that Clinton has an "extremely vulnerable" record on that front.

Clinton responded by pointing to the accomplishment she details in her book, "Hard Choices."

"Maybe I should send a copy of it to my Republican friend," she quipped.

Associated Press: "Seeking The Limelight, Biden Courts Key Dem Groups"

July 22, 2014, 6:17 p.m. EDT

Caught in Hillary Rodham Clinton's perpetual shadow, Joe Biden is working to boost his political profile among key Democratic voting blocs, a move that could help the vice president fashion himself as a more liberal alternative in the 2016 presidential race.

Major speeches this week to the NAACP and the Urban League will give Biden prime opportunities to court African-American voters who twice helped deliver the White House to President Barack Obama. He'll do his part to help Democrats in the battleground state of Nevada at a campaign rally Wednesday. And last week, Biden wooed liberals at a pair of grassroots summits, basking in the adoration of activists who chanted "We love Joe."

Biden knows he's not the first name that comes to mind as the Democratic Party's likeliest next presidential candidate. That distinction belongs to Clinton, who dominates in early primary polls and has well-funded political groups trying to draft her to run.

But in recent days, Biden has emerged as a frequent headliner for left-leaning groups, keeping his name high on the list of Democrats who could challenge Clinton or pursue the nomination if she doesn't run. He's joined on that list by Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren and Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who are pitching populist themes that appeal to those in the party's liberal wing who insist Clinton doesn't have a lock on the nomination.

"I don't take a back seat to anyone when it comes to fighting some of the toughest progressive battles the country has seen," Biden said last week in an energetic speech in Detroit to Netroots Nation.

A day earlier, Biden was at Generation Progress in Washington, where he said he'd been on the "front lines" promoting liberal priorities such as income equality and climate change. He reminded listeners of his early backing for gay marriage, noting how he'd come out in support ahead of Obama. Left unsaid: He also beat Clinton to the cause.

Biden hasn't announced whether he'll run in 2016, but he maintains close ties to early voting states like Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina, and is fundraising aggressively for Democrats this year. He's also differentiated himself from Clinton by stressing his lack of personal wealth just as Clinton was getting flak for raking in massive speaking fees, declaring recently that he was once "the poorest man in Congress."

Maria Cardona, a Democratic strategist, said if Biden is considering another run, putting himself in front of the Democratic base is exactly the right strategy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Until somebody announces, this is anyone's game," Cardona said. "If the vice president knows that he's interested in this, it would be politically stupid for him not to be doing what he's doing."

Biden's string of speeches comes as advocacy groups across the country are convening for their annual conventions, and it's not unusual for vice presidents to appear at such events. The vice president's office said Biden doesn't have any other speaking engagements scheduled for the foreseeable future.

Biden's remarks Wednesday in Las Vegas to the NAACP, the nation's oldest civil rights organization, precede a Thursday speech at the National Urban League Conference in Ohio, another key presidential state. In between, Biden will rally for House candidate Erin Bilbray, who is running to unseat Rep. Joe Heck, R-Nev. Although Heck is outpacing Bilbray in fundraising, the race has attracted national attention from Democrats.

Associated Press: "Pat Schroeder: Clinton Would Face 'Subdued Sexism'"

July 22, 2014, 9:02 p.m. EDT

Former House Democrat Pat Schroeder predicts that Hillary Clinton would face "a lot of sexism" if she decides to run for president in 2016.

Schroeder served in the House from 1973 to 1997 as the first woman elected to Congress from Colorado. Now 73, she appears in "Makers: Women in Politics," a film airing this fall on PBS.

She was asked about Clinton on Tuesday at a summer TV critics' meeting.

"She's still going to have a lot of sexism," Schroeder said. "I can't believe there's people saying can she still be a grandmother and be a president. There are people making snide comments about her age. It's a little more subdued sexism, but it's very much there."

Clinton, 66, has yet to announce whether she intends to run in 2016. The former first lady, U.S. senator and secretary of state will become a grandmother this year when her daughter Chelsea gives birth.

Schroeder said she believes Clinton would bring a different approach to working with critics than President Obama.

"She understands how mean they are and she understands she's got to come back at them with more force," Schroeder said. "Obama thought he could bring everyone together. That just isn't working in Washington right now."

Schroeder ran for president but withdrew from contention in September 1987. While in Congress, she was the first woman to serve on the House Armed Services Committee.

She balanced congressional work with motherhood early in her tenure and was known for her focus on work-family issues.

Real Clear Politics: "Bachmann Says She Might Seek Presidency in 2016"

By Scott Conroy

July 22, 2014

Though set to retire from the U.S. House after her term expires at the end of this year, Michele Bachmann may not be done with electoral politics.

The Minnesota congresswoman and 2012 Republican presidential candidate told RealClearPolitics on Tuesday that she is considering a second White House run.

Bachmann made the revelation during an interview, in which she was asked for her view on whether any Republican women might seek the Oval Office in 2016.

"The only thing that the media has speculated on is that it's going to be various men that are running," she replied. "They haven't speculated, for instance, that I'm going to run. What if I decide to run? And there's a chance I could run."

Bachmann entered the last presidential race in June 2011 as a long-shot contender but was able to use her sway with elements of the Tea Party and an effective media campaign to rise temporarily toward the front of the Republican pack in a deeply fluid race.

The high point of her candidacy came in August 2011 when she won the Ames Straw Poll in Iowa.

But Bachmann's campaign soon withered amid a string of gaffes and controversial claims, staff defections, and a rise in the fortunes of other candidates in the race.

She ended up finishing in sixth place in the Iowa caucuses less than five months after her Ames triumph, earning just 5 percent of the vote and dropping out the next day.

The four-term congresswoman that she would "certainly" reap the benefits of having run once before, if she were to launch a second White House bid.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Like with anything else, practice makes perfect,” she said. “And I think if a person has gone through the process -- for instance, I had gone through 15 presidential debates -- it’s easy to see a person’s improvement going through that.”

In November 2012, Bachmann barely managed to hold onto her 6th District seat, defeating hotel executive Jim Graves by 4,298 votes. Last May, she announced that she would not seek a fifth term in the House.

Bachmann told RCP that if she decides to run for president again, she will make sure that she has a strong campaign infrastructure in place.

“I haven’t made a decision one way or another if I’m going to run again, but I think the organization is probably the key,” she said. “To have an organization and people who surround you who are loyal, who are highly competent, who know how to be able to run the ball down the field in state after state -- because now I think the primary process will be very different this time. It will tighten up; it will be a much shorter run than it was before.”

Bachmann said that she is looking at “a lot of different options” for her post-congressional life and that another presidential campaign is just one of them.

If she were to run again, Bachmann could struggle to be seen as a credible candidate in what is expected to be a far stronger Republican field in 2016 than the one that she competed in four years earlier.

But in the interview, Bachmann alluded to her fundraising prowess as a reason she should be taken seriously, calling herself “one of the top -- if not the top -- fundraisers in the history of the United States Congress.”

“And it’s because people saw that I had an authentic voice, and I was fighting for them,” she said. “I wasn’t speaking to them like a politician. I was speaking like a real person who was fighting for what they believed in.”

Asked to assess the relative strengths and weaknesses of Hillary Clinton’s potential candidacy, Bachmann said that the presumed 2016 Democratic frontrunner has “fatal problems” related to her tenure as secretary of state that should “disqualify her” from the nation’s highest office.

Bachmann suggested that she would zero in on making her own 2016 decision soon after she wraps up her tenure in the House.

“I think it’s important to have sufficient time to lay the necessary groundwork to have a really solid campaign and a campaign team put together,” she said. “And I think probably I would think about that decision earlier than I did last time.”

Debates”

By William A. Galston

July 22, 2014, 7:19 p.m. EDT

These are tough times for internationalists, liberal and conservative alike. George W. Bush's overreach in Iraq undermined public support for the use of American power overseas, and Barack Obama has done nothing to rebuild it. Large majorities of Americans believe that our involvement in Iraq and Afghanistan was a mistake. A July 21 Politico survey of likely voters in battleground states found that only 39% think that we have a responsibility to do something about the mess we left behind in Mesopotamia.

The survey also found that by a margin of 3 to 1, Americans reject the sweeping vision Mr. Bush enunciated in his second inaugural address and would instead confine the use of American military power to direct threats to our national security. In the same poll, completed before the downing of the Malaysia Airlines 3786.KU -2.17% passenger plane, only 17% thought we should get more involved in the confrontation between Russia and Ukraine.

The desire for some nation-building here at home is palpable and understandable. Nevertheless, the forthcoming presidential campaign is likely to feature an unusually spirited debate—within as well as between the parties—about America's role in the world.

The outline of this debate among Republicans is easy to foresee. Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul has articulated a coherent message of government restraint abroad as well as at home and has proved adept at making a libertarian-leaning agenda more broadly acceptable to conservatives. The young adults who flocked to his father's rallies seem especially receptive to his critique of military intervention and NSA surveillance. Texas Gov. Rick Perry, whose political instincts seem to have improved since 2012, has publicly challenged Mr. Paul for his alleged isolationism, and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio has positioned himself as his generation's torchbearer for a muscular internationalism based on American leadership.

Most Republican contenders are likely to side with their party's national-defense orthodoxy of recent decades. Still, Mr. Paul's self-confidence and political skills could carry him far in a divided field and might even gain him the nomination. That would be an earthquake within the Republican Party and present a tough choice for staunch hawks like John McCain and Lindsey Graham. Mr. McCain has publicly said as much.

Although it may not occur, the Democrats are poised for a similar debate. The only significant difference between Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton in 2008 was her vote for the Iraq war, which probably cost her the presidential nomination. Little has changed. During her tenure as secretary of state, Mrs. Clinton was among the administration's toughest voices during internal debates. She supported the use of American air power in Libya, and the Navy SEAL raid that killed Osama bin Laden. (Both Vice President Joe Biden and Defense Secretary Robert Gates opposed it.)

Strong legal support from Mrs. Clinton's State Department for President Obama's expansive use of drones surprised many observers. She was an advocate for the 2009 surge of U.S. forces in Afghanistan and favored maintaining a residual American force in Iraq after the end of our combat missions. While not opposed to nuclear negotiations with Iran, she has expressed mistrust about Iranian intentions and has opposed a policy of "containing" a nuclear-armed Tehran if diplomacy fails. As president, it seems reasonable to conclude, Mrs. Clinton would make decisions about using American power based on prudential considerations, not instinctive aversion.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For the record: Even though I opposed the Iraq war from the start, I believe that Hillary Clinton's judgment on defense and foreign policy issues has been right far more often than it was wrong and that she would serve our country well as commander in chief.

But rank-and-file Democrats are no less dovish today than they were in 2008. Although attention has focused recently on the clash between "populist" and "Wall Street" Democrats, the potential for an intraparty debate on foreign policy seems just as real. While Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren has consistently denied her intention to run if Mrs. Clinton enters the race, Vice President Biden has made no such pledge. Estes Kefauver, the 1956 Democratic vice-presidential nominee, once remarked that the only known cure for persistent presidential ambition was "embalming fluid."

Mr. Biden is well-positioned to wage a left-leaning campaign on foreign policy as well as economic issues. Although he voted for the Iraq-war authorization in 2002, he argued vehemently against the Bush administration's surge in 2007, proposing instead the quasi-partition of Iraq into autonomous Kurdish, Sunni and Shiite zones. As vice president, he argued just as hard against Gen. David Petraeus's proposal (backed by then-Secretary of State Clinton) for a massive military surge and nation-building policy in Afghanistan. And he has taken U.S. military action against Iran off the table, declaring that "war with Iran is not just a bad option. It would be a disaster."

These issues matter, not just for the U.S., but for the world. During the Cold War, American retreat usually meant Soviet advance. Now it most often means anarchy. The question is whether the American people can be persuaded that they should care.

Politico Magazine: Daniel Halper: “My Battle With the Clintons”

By Daniel Halper

When I started to write Clinton, Inc: The Audacious Rebuilding of a Political Machine, I knew the reaction to expect. I was well aware that the former (and perhaps future) first family and its massive retinue of loyalty enforcers, professional defamers and assorted gadflies would rue my intent to examine the real Clintons—especially in my search for the real Chelsea Clinton, who until now has been a media-protected nonperson despite her aggressive public activities on her family’s behalf and despite raking in hundreds of thousands of dollars from her role as former first daughter.

MSNBC’s David Shuster learned this the hard way when he was suspended from the network for saying, “But doesn’t it seem like Chelsea’s sort of being pimped out in some weird sort of way?” in a live TV hit on how the former first daughter was being used by her mother’s 2008 campaign. The Clintons hit the roof over the single relatively banal comment, as I report in my book, and lobbied the head of parent company GE to get Shuster off the air.

I also had a feeling that some of the sources I spoke to, for and not-for attribution, including alleged Clinton mistresses who’ve stayed out of the press and remain loyal to Bill, would alert the Clintons to what I was doing and help them prepare a counterattack.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But even if I hadn't known it, many, many people in Washington, on the left and right, popped up to warn me of what to expect from the Clinton PR team. Other authors—legitimate ones with serious pedigrees—who'd written about the Clintons said they were threatened and verbally attacked. Of course, nearly everyone in Washington has seen the much-vaunted Clinton PR machine in action. It's very predictable. Here's how it works:

1) Media intimidation tactics: Following their usual method of operation, the first thing Team Clinton would do is attempt a media blackout. A producer with CNN said I'd never be able to get any airtime on her show because the Clintons punish networks that give space to their perceived enemies. So far, even claims in my book that were well sourced with on-the-record quotes—such as Bill Clinton offering counsel to John McCain in how to defeat Barack Obama in 2008—have been all but ignored by the mainstream media.

2) Defame and attack: There would be repeated efforts to turn me into a kook or right-wing hit man. Though they haven't yet gone so far to label me a "crazed stalker" like they did with Monica Lewinsky, the reliable Clinton aide Nick Merrill has repeatedly deployed a classic Clinton spin line on my work—before it was even on sale, mind you, and presumably he hadn't yet read it. "It's sad to see Daniel Halper join the discredited and disgraced ranks" of other authors supposedly out to get them at all costs, he emailed the Huffington Post. Sadly, I received no credit from the Clintons or from Merrill for the praise of both Bill (that he's a "political genius) and Hillary (that she's "intensely likable") in various parts of the book. Merrill also claimed I was just out "to make a buck." Which I take it means that Bill and Hillary Clinton donated all the proceeds of their millions in book deals to charity?

3) The "old news" trick: A favorite gambit is to make any allegation unfavorable to the Clintons as old news. One of the best examples of this came from Clinton media minder Philippe Reines about a book by Jeff Gerth: "Is it possible to be quoted yawning?"Yawn. No biggie. You reporters are fools for even covering it.

Daniel Halper is author of Clinton, Inc.: The Audacious Rebuilding of a Political Machine and online editor of The Weekly Standard.

4) The dark arts: Some prominent media personalities with experience covering the Clintons in the 1990s told me that their team would have no problem with, say, copying every page of someone's manuscript, sending it out to reporters ahead of publication, and then depicting it as a right-wing smear job. Funny thing, that exact thing happened with my book, as POLITICO noted.

At first, I resisted the temptation to conclude the Clintons were behind this, but now certain events have led me to believe the Clinton team has had copies of this book for some time. Why might they leak the book early? The best explanation is so that the book's contents could come out well before publication and the Clintons can then rely on another standard mode of operation—denouncing any unfavorable allegations as "old news."

In short, the Clinton team has been true to form so far. And I'm surprised by little of it.

What has surprised me, however, is what the Clintonistas are already doing to their own. In the introduction to my book, I describe what I was told about the Clinton operation. As I put it there, "Nearly everyone in Washington has a Clinton story, or two, or two hundred, but many are afraid to air them publicly or on the record, out of fear of retribution or attack from ruthless Clinton aides and their media allies. … Thus it is pretty clear why less powerful figures inside Clinton, Inc. insist on anonymity. The panic among Clintonites, past and present, is palpable."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's one thing to hear about it in the abstract. It's quite another to see it in action. To wit:

While I was still reporting on my book, James Carville's office called, seemingly out of the blue, to grill me on whom I'd already spoken to. I obviously refused to indulge the questioner.

Someone from Bill Clinton's publisher went to mine, HarperCollins, asking questions about my book and what I might be planning.

I write in my book that "Clintonites are known to scour through magazine articles and books to try to decipher blind quotes and tie them to a suspect." I believed that was true. But now I know it is. This is in fact happening with my book as I write this, I've learned, and has been happening for days, if not weeks. Some are throwing other people to the wolves.

Other Clintonites named in the book are heading for the hills. Some preposterously denied that they ever talked to me. Perhaps it's buyer's remorse—but more likely they know the Clinton code of omerta.

I've found the task of covering the Clintons fascinating. They're not exactly the people we see on television. Although many believe Hillary is the cold, calculating and cunning Clinton and Bill is the emotive and gregarious, the exact opposite seems to be a more accurate portrayal of who they really are. As for Chelsea? It would appear from tip to toe she's daddy's little girl—and the wizard behind the curtain.

It's been a wild ride, and I've really been intrigued by my encounters with some of the (many) kooky characters in Clinton, Inc.

Maybe I'll have to do a sequel.

Washington Free Beacon: Daniel Halper: "Chasing Hillary"

By Daniel Halper

July 23, 2014, 5:00 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Book: Biden, O'Malley, Schweitzer, Klobuchar, Emanuel, Cuomo, and Warren preparing to run if Hillary Clinton bows out

Among Democrats who hope Hillary Clinton doesn't run—and their number is larger than one might think—the complaints are familiar. Age and stamina are the obvious considerations. "Look at Obama's hair color, just like George Bush's," says a prominent Washington insider. "Somebody who's seventy shouldn't be president. And I think that's going to be an interesting issue against her, but who in the Democratic Party is going to have the guts to take on that machine?" A former Clinton campaign adviser is equally blunt. "This is gonna sound superficial”—which is an understatement—“but men do age better than women,” he says. “At seventy she’s not gonna be—it’s not gonna be great.”

Democrats fear she is too radioactive. One of many prominent D.C. Democrats who will only comment on background out of fear of inciting Clintonian wrath complains that “she will lose the general because her negatives are so high.” Then there is the not-so-secret fact that she is not a very good candidate. Hillary is often compared to the kind of politician always better in concept than as an actual flesh-and-blood candidate. Many compare her unfavorably to Al Gore or John Kerry or even Mitt Romney, stiff policy wonks with difficulty making personal connections.

Some will chalk this up to sexism—or at least the difference between men and women politicians. It is not that Hillary is not a good politician, they will say, but that American politics is not used to female candidates. “We are only now growing used to the style of women in politics. You know, they’re not backslappers, even if they are natural politicians,” says political adviser Bob Shrum, who helped lead Al Gore’s and John Kerry’s presidential campaigns. Hillary, he insists, has grown into a natural politician.

But the real question being asked in Washington is not whether Hillary can be beaten as such, as it is whether any prominent Democrat has the guts to try to stop her.

The most obvious primary challenger, of course, is the one most often discounted. Vice President Joe Biden will turn seventy-four in late 2016. Gaffe-prone and perennially underestimated, Biden is expected to quietly step aside for the Clintons, with whom he’s had a long and friendly relationship. Unless, of course, you ask Joe Biden.

Maybe Obama has forgotten all the trash talk Hillary leveled against Obama back then—but Biden hasn’t. “You decide which makes more sense—entrust our country to someone who is ready on Day One . . . or to put America in the hands of someone with little national or international experience, who started running for president the day he arrived in the United States Senate,” Hillary Clinton told a reporter in 2007. “He was a part-time state senator for a few years, and then he came to the Senate and immediately started running for president,”1 she said in early 2007. And that was just the stuff she said on the record.

After Hillary left the secretary of state’s office, the world went on, and so did the administration. If anything, it was hard to notice she was gone. Except for personnel: Obama was free to shift over his traveling campaign press secretary, Jen Psaki, the dashing redhead who had been so harsh to Hillary on the campaign trail in 2008 that she was not allowed near the State Department until Hillary was out of Foggy Bottom. And most of the Clinton loyalists who had come to the State Department four years earlier left to cool their heels in various positions out of government while Hillary cooled hers.

On policy, John Kerry, some thought, did more for the administration in his first year than she did in her four years. He was able to carry out a key goal of President Obama’s, by beginning to work out the structure of what could be a landmark deal with Iran. And with respect to Syria, Kerry gained plaudits from pundits—and the dovish Obama—for his ability to wage hard-nosed diplomacy by publicly signaling that a deal brokered with the Russians could avert an American strike in the Middle East country. Hillary didn’t accomplish any of that. Instead, she claimed credit for the miles she flew, as if that mattered.

A former high-ranking official in the Clinton administration recently spoke to his friend Biden about Hillary’s 2016 maneuvering.

“You going to step aside for her?” he asked. “No,” the vice president replied confidently. “Fuck no.” Traditionally Biden’s stance might pose problems for Hillary. After all, vice presidents tend to win the nominations of their parties. But Biden has a major drawback. He lacks the support, even the quiet support, of the president he serves.

None of this has stopped the vice president from making plans, however. Biden has run for president twice before—in 1988, when he was forced to drop out over plagiarism charges, and again in 2008, when he was barely an asterisk against Obama and Clinton. And he still has the bug, fiercely jealous of the tendency in the press to write him off in favor of endless stories about Hillary's maneuverings.

"And let me not forget Joe Biden, because he will call me this after- noon and remind me," Democrat Donna Brazile once half joked during a Sunday talk show appearance where she discussed the Clinton campaign in waiting.

She isn't the only one. The vice president or his senior aides at his behest will call reporters, pundits, anyone he feels is not giving his candidacy the credibility it deserves. He wants respect.

Though stranger things have happened in politics—like a one-term senator defeating the Clintons in 2008—few give Biden much chance of a surprise victory. One former Senate colleague says Biden could never be president. "He makes people like him, but lack of discipline is his weakness," the senator says. "She's far more disciplined and calculating."

"If you take a look at every important thing that's come out of the White House, Biden's had his finger on it," says a Clinton aide. "So, people underestimate Biden, and part of being a VP is being derided to a certain extent." Still, he adds, "He can't beat Hillary in '16 because she starts with eighteen million votes. Everyone that voted for her in '08 wants her to run again."

Shrum agrees. "I think [Biden] will recognize that reality," he says.

Allies of the vice president of course disagree with this assessment. Biden also knows there is a chance that the Clintons are bluffing. Signaling that she's running for president to get attention, speaking fees, book deals, but not really ready to hop in. Biden, too, is gambling on her health.

So are some Republicans. "I must admit I'm completely befuddled," admits Bush strategist Karl Rove. "My brain says yes, she's the front- runner. My gut tells me we don't know everything about the health issue."

But if Hillary is bluffing, she's doing an excellent job. Leaving nothing to chance, the undeclared candidate has gone out of her way to take swipes at Biden—something she wouldn't likely do if her 2016 effort is just a feint. At a private event in Georgia in 2013, for example, she was asked a question about the bin Laden raid. "She took 25 minutes to answer," a Republican state legislator present at the gathering told the Atlanta newspaper. "Time and time again . . . Clinton mentioned the vice president's opposition to the raid, while characterizing herself and Leon Panetta, then director of the Central Intelligence Agency, as the action's most fierce advocates, the paper reported."

Dr. Jill Biden, the vice president's wife, is said to be actively "counting down the days" until she can return to "normal" life. Some close to the Bidens speculate that she would "kill him if he decided to run for president." Especially a race she doesn't think he can win. That appears to be the only thing holding back a potential Biden 2016 run.

Among those not so secretly preparing the ground in case of a Hillary demurral: Senator Amy Klobuchar of

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Minnesota; Chicago mayor Rahm Emanuel; and New York governor Andrew Cuomo. But they seem to believe, as one Democratic strategist put it, that “Hillary gets the first right of refusal.”

Observers believe the more potent threat is the little-known but aggressive governor of Maryland, Martin O’Malley. O’Malley would be fifty-four years old on Inauguration Day 2017—fifteen years younger than Hillary Clinton. He is a handsome man with impeccable liberal credentials, and “a fucking political animal,” according to Maryland politicos who know him.

Political consultants in Maryland say O’Malley is someone who could do serious damage to Hillary Clinton in the primary. One listed his assets in a race against the frontrunner: “He is mean. He has a long history of negative campaigning. He’s a good fundraiser.” In other words he’s a younger Bill Clinton.

“He’s very Bill Clinton-esque,” another consultant says. “He’s very good shaking hands and politicking.” He’s even rumored to have women issues like the former president, though none have ever been proven.

Former Vermont governor Howard Dean, who might have been expected to support O’Malley in a primary challenge, especially considering his implicit criticisms of the Clintons when Dean ran for president himself in 2004, has fallen under the Clinton sway. The once-maverick liberal firebrand has become increasingly establishment—in fact, he chaired the Democratic National Committee during the Obama-Hillary race. “I will support her against any other foreseeable Democratic candidate,” Dean told me. But he held open at least a little wiggle room. “I like Martin O’Malley a lot.”

Disclosing that he had a recent conversation with O’Malley—“I’m not going to tell you what the conversation was,” he snapped—he adds, “I think O’Malley is very serious” about running for president in 2016.

By setting himself up as Obama’s true heir, O’Malley is poised to run to Hillary’s left. He’s been an enthusiastic backer of Obamacare and vowed to lead the nation in sign-ups for the controversial program. Major Democrats know that he’s going to be a problem for her. So they’re trying to find a way to give him something to do. He’s tested the New Hampshire waters, according to CNN, where he played a video summary of his career starting as mayor of Baltimore, which said, “Martin O’Malley formulated an assault on hopelessness.” And it claimed that he transformed Baltimore while curbing crime and took his good governance to the Maryland State House in Annapolis. It was a three-and-a-half-minute-long campaign “video befitting a national political convention-style rollout,” said CNN. And of course it was released in New Hampshire, traditionally the first state in the nation to hold a primary. As a Maryland Republican says, “He’s running, unless they buy him off.”

The most obvious payoff, of course, would be the vice presidency. A former Clinton aide envisions a scenario in which Hillary offers him the job to keep him out of the race, or to have him run as a “puppet” opposition candidate. “He’s good looking, Irish Catholic, and young,” the aide reasons. “She’s gonna need some youth, so Martin is the logical pick.”

Brian Schweitzer, a former Democratic governor from Montana, is another wild card. He’s positioning himself as an anti-corporatist, gun- toting populist who’s not shy about bringing up Hillary’s support for both the war in Iraq and the war in Afghanistan. He’s already done that in Iowa, the state to hold the first caucus in the nation—and one where Hillary got tripped up in 2008 when she lost the contest there to Obama.

Antiwar rhetoric is a political weapon that’s previously proven to be lethal on the political left—after all, it’s not at all dissimilar from the public positions that Barack Obama was able to use to undercut the candidacy of Hillary Clinton in the 2008 Democratic primary.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Schweitzer might not be known yet, but that doesn't mean he can't level the primary field just by appearing in many debates (and performing well) before a nationally broadcast audience.

The same is true for Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts. Her very candidacy would undercut Hillary's bid to be the first female president and her liberal credentials are superb. Before being a U.S. senator she was the brains in the Obama administration behind the establishment of the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau. She is no pragmatist. She is purely an ideologue—which can be very helpful for riling up the base in a party primary.

Then of course there is the possibility of California Gov. Jerry Brown, who ran a stronger than expected primary campaign against Bill Clinton in 1992. Brown, a popular and well-known figure on the political left, has refused to rule out a run. But at seventy-six, and with a personal life that long has been the subject of a whispering campaign, Brown is an unlikely threat. He most likely seems to be basking in the attention that comes from having his name mentioned.

Jake,
We need to keep the military option on the table, but it would be the additional sanctions in the new congressional bill, which would give the future President the right to impose them upon a finding of a violation. But it would als include current sanctions--SWIFT, CBI, etc.

Thanks Stu. What would those sanctions look like? If Iran actually tried to break out at the end of the period, ostensibly we'd be talking about military action?

Dear Jake,

Attached is my speech at AIPAC yesterday to the Rabbinical Assembly, the organization of Conservative American Rabbis, on rising anti-Semitism in Europe; the Iran nuclear negotiations; and U.S.-Israel relations.

I would like to suggest for Secretary Clinton that on the most sensitive issue, Iran, she be generally supportive of an agreement along the lines I outlined, but, crucially, she indicate (a) grave concerns that Iran's missile program is unconstrained and has no civilian purpose, and that we should make its restraint a priority; (b) that Congress should pass additional sanctions after an agreement that could be imposed by a future President following the 10-15 year expiration period of the agreement, if Iran seeks a "breakout" at that point. In other words, one major flaw in the emerging agreement is that Iran would be free of constraints after the period. She should take the position that unless Iran radically changes its posture over this period of time, the U.S. should never allow Iran to become a nuclear weapons state, as North Korea is now.

This position would be supportive of the Obama Administration's efforts, but would signal a tougher position on what a post-agreement world should look like.

Best wishes,

Stu

Assault Weapons are Weapons of Mass Destruction and Should Be Banned
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/robert-creamer/assault-weapons-are-weapo_b_2313290.html

The tragedy in Connecticut forces America to confront a simple question: why should we allow easy access to a weapon of mass destruction just because it could conceivably be referred to as a "gun"?

I count myself among the many Americans who at various points in their lives have owned and used long guns -- hunting rifles and shotguns – for hunting and target shooting. No one I know in politics seriously proposes that ordinary Americans be denied the right to own those kinds of weapons.

But guns used for hunting have nothing in common with assault weapons like the ones that were used last week in the mass murder of 20 first-graders – except the fact that they are referred to "guns."

Rapid-fire assault weapons with large clips of ammunition have only one purpose: the mass slaughter of large numbers of human beings. They were designed for use by the military to achieve that mission in combat – and that mission alone.

No one argues that other combat weapons like rocket-propelled grenades (RPG's) or Stinger Missiles should be widely available to anyone at a local gun shop. Why in the world should we allow pretty much anyone to have easy access to assault weapons?

Every politician in America will tell you they will move heaven and earth to prevent weapons of mass destruction from falling into the hands of terrorists. Yet we have allowed the ban on this particular weapon of mass destruction to expire. As a result, a terrorist named Adam Lanza was able to have easy access to the assault weapons he used to kill scores of children in minutes.

Let's be clear, Adam Lanza was a terrorist just as surely as he would have been if we were motivated by an extreme jihadist ideology. It makes no difference to those children or to their grieving families whether their loved ones were killed by someone who was mentally deranged or by someone who believed that by killing children he was helping to destroying the great Satan.

When an individual is willing – or perhaps eager – to die making a big "statement" by killing many of his fellow human beings, it doesn't matter what their motivation is. It does matter whether they have easy access to the weapons that make mass murder possible.

And after last week, can anyone seriously question whether assault weapons are in fact weapons of mass destruction? And after last week, can anyone seriously question whether assault weapons are in fact weapons of mass destruction? If Lanza had conventional guns -- or like a man in China who recently went berserk, he only had knives -- he would not have been physically capable of killing so many people in a few short minutes.

Of course you hear people say – oh, a car or an airliner can be turned into a weapon of mass destruction – many things can become weapons of mass destruction.. And there is no question after 9/11 that we know that this is true. But cars and airliners have to be converted from their primary use in order to become instruments of mass death. It takes an elaborate plot and many actors to take over an airliner and it isn't easy to methodically kill 27 people with a car.

More important, assault weapons have no redeeming social value or alternative use whatsoever. The only reason to purchase an assault weapon, instead of a long gun used for target practice or hunting, is to kill and maim large numbers of human beings.

And it is not the case that if assault weapons were banned ordinary people would get them anyway. We certainly don't take that attitude with nuclear weapons or dirty bombs. We make it very hard for a terrorist to get nuclear weapons or dirty bomb. It used to be hard to get assault weapons.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When the former President of Mexico visited the United States some time ago to discuss the drug-fueled violence on the Mexican border, he pointed out that the end of the assault weapons ban in the U.S. had resulted in an explosion of smuggling of assault weapons from the United States to Mexico. Weapons that were previously unavailable in large numbers, became plentiful. He begged the United States to re-impose the assault weapons ban.

Allowing easy access to assault weapons guarantees that terrorists, criminals and mentally unstable people will use them to commit future acts of mass murder – it's that simple. There are 7 billion people on the planet. Try as we may, we are not going to prevent some of those 7 billion people from becoming terrorists, criminals or mentally unstable. Why make it easy for them to do harm to their fellow human beings by giving them easy access to a weapon of mass destruction?

Since this tragedy, there have been calls for greater restrictions and background checks on those who can buy guns – and there should be. But from all accounts, the weapons used in the Connecticut murders were purchased legally by the shooter's mother – who herself appeared to be perfectly sane right up to the moment that Lanza used those same weapons to end her life.

The NRA will no doubt repeat its mantra about the "slippery slope." "If we ban assault weapons, shotguns will be next", they say. Really? By banning anyone from buying Stinger Missiles that are used to shoot down airplanes do we make it more likely that the Government will one day prevent people from hunting ducks?

The simple fact is that no right is absolute because rights come into conflict with each other. Your free speech does not give you the right to cry "fire" in a crowded theater.

Is the NRA's concern that banning assault weapons will put us on a "slippery slope" more important than the lives of those 20 first graders? Should it really take precedence over the fact that today in Newtown, Connecticut there are 20 families with holiday presents on a closet shelf, that were purchased for an excited 6-year-old who will never open them?

Are the NRA's fears more important than the terror faced by children in the Sandy Hook Elementary school last week?

Does the right to own an assault weapon take precedence over the right of those parents to see their children grow up, and graduate from college, and stand at the alter to be married, and have children of their own?

The bottom line is that there is no reason why weapons of mass destruction of any sort – chemical weapons, biological weapons, RPG's, improvised explosive devices (IED's), missiles, dirty bombs, nuclear devices, or assault weapons -- should be easily accessible. For ten years there was a ban on the production, ownership and use of assault weapons in the United States until Congress and the Bush Administration allowed it to lapse when it sunset and came up for reauthorization in 2004.

A serious response to the tragedy in Connecticut requires that Congress act to reinstate the assault weapons ban before the children of other families fall victim to the fantasies of some other mentally unbalanced individual – or the ideology of a terrorist who has been empowered by our failure to act.

DNC Chair Statement on Marco Rubio's 2016 Announcement

Washington, DC – In response to Marco Rubio's announcement that he will run for president in 2016, DNC Chair Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz released the following statement:

"As Marco Rubio's presidential campaign gets underway, expect him to try and portray himself as a bold, new leader with fresh ideas. But the truth is – as those of us in Florida know all too well – he's simply peddling the same stale, harmful wares that the rest of the Republican Party is selling.

"At every opportunity, Rubio has revealed his true colors - taking outdated positions that match up with the Republican base instead of doing what's best for his constituents and the country. Rather than propose a serious tax plan that aims to grow the middle class and expand opportunity for all Americans, his plan is a GOP wish list - slashing taxes for those at the top and shifting the burden onto working Americans. He even went so far as to run away from his own immigration plan when the most extreme wing of his party put pressure on him, and he supported shutting the government down to deny people quality health care, costing our economy $24 billion.

"Rubio says he's a new type of Republican, but the only things he's ever championed are the same failed policies the public has already rejected, and the only cause he's ever advanced is his own."

for the wealthiest at the expense of hardworking families, repealing the Affordable Care Act and returning power to the insurance companies, opposing marriage equality, and opposing a woman's right to choose. Marco Rubio would erase the progress we have made and turn back the clock for women, for young people, for Latinos, and for the middle class.

Backwards for the hardworking families: Rubio's tax plan would lower taxes on corporations and raise tax rates for hardworking Americans.

Backwards for women: Rubio voted against reauthorizing the Violence Against Women Act. He opposes equal pay legislation, saying it was "wasting time." Rubio has declared that he would oppose a woman's right to make her own health care decisions "even if 100 percent of my constituents were for it."

Backwards for young people: Marco Rubio voted to block a bill that would allow students to refinance their student loans.

Backwards for Latinos: Marco Rubio ran away from his own immigration reform package, bowing to political pressure, and he wants to end deportation relief that is keeping families together.

Just talked over "course correction." Ended with us thinking it was not worth forsaking high ground and could drive headlines of her attacking him as opposed to headline of her exciting Democrats.
Anyone have concerns?

Here's Obama in 2007:

Barack Obama, 2007

Thank you so much. To the great Governor of Iowa and Lieutenant. Governor of Iowa. To my dear friend Tom Harkin for the outstanding work that he does. To the congressional delegation of Iowa that is doing outstanding work and to Nancy Pelosi , Madam Speaker, thank you all for the wonderful welcome and the wonderful hospitality.

[Responding to audience] I love you back.

A little less than one year from today, you will go into the voting booth and you will select the President of the United States of America. Now, here's the good news -- the name

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

George W. Bush will not be on the ballot. The name of my cousin Dick Cheney will not be on the ballot. We've been trying to hide that for a long time. Everybody has a black sheep in the family. The era of Scooter Libby justice, and Brownie incompetence, and Karl Rove politics will finally be over.

But the question you're going to have to ask yourself when you caucus in January and you vote in November is, "What's next for America?" We are in a defining moment in our history. Our nation is at war. The planet is in peril. The dream that so many generations fought for feels as if it's slowly slipping away. We are working harder for less. We've never paid more for health care or for college. It's harder to save and it's harder to retire. And most of all we've lost faith that our leaders can or will do anything about it.

We were promised compassionate conservatism and all we got was Katrina and wiretaps. We were promised a uniter, and we got a President who could not even lead the half of the country that voted for him. We were promised a more ethical and more efficient government, and instead we have a town called Washington that is more corrupt and more wasteful than it was before. And the only mission that was ever accomplished is to use fear and falsehood to take this country to a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged.

It is because of these failures that America is listening, intently, to what we say here today -- not just Democrats, but Republicans and Independents who've lost trust in their government, but want to believe again.

And it is because of these failures that we not only have a moment of great challenge, but also a moment of great opportunity. We have a chance to bring the country together in a new majority -- to finally tackle problems that George Bush made far worse, but that had festered long before George Bush ever took office -- problems that we've talked about year after year after year after year.

And that is why the same old Washington textbook campaigns just won't do in this election. That's why not answering questions, because we are afraid our answers won't be popular just won't do. That's why telling the American people what we think they want to hear instead of telling the American people what they need to hear just won't do. Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do. If we are really serious about wining this election Democrats, we can't live in fear of losing it.
This party -- the party of Jefferson and Jackson; of Roosevelt and Kennedy -- has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose -- a higher purpose. And I run for the Presidency of the United States of America because that's the party America needs us to be right now.

A party that offers not just a difference in policies, but a difference in leadership.

A party that doesn't just focus on how to win but why we should. A party that doesn't just offer change as a slogan, but real, meaningful change -- change that America can believe in. That's why I'm in this race. That's why I am running for the Presidency of the United States of America -- to offer change that we can believe in.

I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more than any other candidate in this race to take on lobbyists -- and won. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am President. I'm in this race to take those tax breaks away from companies that are moving jobs overseas and put them in the pockets of hard working Americans who deserve it. And I won't raise the minimum wage every ten years -- I will raise it to keep pace so that workers don't' fall behind.

That is why I am in it. To protect the American worker. To fight for the American worker.
I'm in this race because I want to stop talking about the outrage of 47 million Americans without health care and start actually doing something about it. I expanded health care in Illinois by bringing Democrats and Republicans together. By taking on the insurance industry. And that is how I will make certain that every single American in this country has health care they can count on and I won't do it twenty years from now, I won't do it ten years from now, I will do it by the end of my first term as President of the United States of America.

I run for president to make sure that every American child has the best education that we have to offer -- from the day they are born to the day they graduate from college. And I won't just talk about how great teachers are -- as President I will reward them for their greatness -- by raising salaries and giving them more support. That's why I'm in this race.

I am running for President because I am sick and tired of democrats thinking that the only way to look tough on national security is by talking, and acting, and voting like George Bush Republicans.

When I am this party's nominee, my opponent will not be able to say that I voted for the war in Iraq; or that I gave George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran; or that I supported Bush-Cheney policies of not talking to leaders that we don't like. And he will not be able to say that I wavered on something as fundamental as whether or not it is ok for America to torture -- because it is never ok. That's why I am in it.

As President, I will end the war in Iraq. We will have our troops home in sixteen months. I will close Guantanamo. I will restore habeas corpus. I will finish the fight against Al Qaeda. And I will lead the world to combat the common threats of the 21st century -- nuclear weapons and terrorism; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. And I will send once more a message to those yearning faces beyond our shores that says, "You matter to us. Your future is our future. And our moment is now."

America, our moment is now.

Our moment is now.

I don't want to spend the next year or the next four years re-fighting the same fights that we had in the 1990s.

I don't want to pit Red America against Blue America, I want to be the President of the United States of America.

And if those Republicans come at me with the same fear-mongering and swift-boating that they usually do, then I will take them head on. Because I believe the American people are tired of fear and tired of distractions and tired of diversions. We can make this election not about fear, but about the future. And that won't just be a Democratic victory; that will be an American victory.

And that is a victory America needs right now.

I am not in this race to fulfill some long-held ambitions or because I believe it's somehow owed to me. I never expected to be here, I always knew this journey was improbable. I've never been on a journey that wasn't.

I am running in this race because of what Dr. King called "the fierce urgency of now." Because I believe that there's such a thing as being too late. And that hour is almost upon us.

I don't want to wake up four years from now and find out that millions of Americans still lack health care because we couldn't take on the insurance industry.

I don't want to see that the oceans have risen a few more inches. The planet has reached a point of no return because we couldn't find a way to stop buying oil from dictators.

I don't want to see more American lives put at risk because no one had the judgment or the courage to stand up against a misguided war before we sent our troops into fight.

I don't want to see homeless veterans on the streets. I don't want to send another generation of American children to failing schools. I don't want that future for my daughters. I don't want that future for your sons. I do not want that future for America.

I'm in this race for the same reason that I fought for jobs for the jobless and hope for the hopeless on the streets of Chicago; for the same reason I fought for justice and equality as a civil rights lawyer; for the same reason that I fought for Illinois families for over a decade.

Because I will never forget that the only reason that I'm standing here today is because somebody, somewhere stood up for me when it was risky. Stood up when it was hard. Stood up when it wasn't popular. And because that somebody stood up, a few more stood up. And then a few thousand stood up. And then a few million stood up. And standing up, with courage and clear purpose, they somehow managed to change the world.

That's why I'm running, Iowa -- to give our children and grandchildren the same chances somebody gave me.

That's why I'm running, Democrats -- to keep the American Dream alive for those who still hunger for opportunity, who still thirst for equality.

That's why I'm asking you to stand with me, that's why I'm asking you to caucus for me, that's why I am asking you to stop settling for what the cynics say we have to accept. In this election -- in this moment -- let us reach for what we know is possible. A nation healed. A world repaired. An America that believes again. Thank you very much everybody.

While Aide Advised McCain, His Firm Lobbied for Georgia (Washington Post 8/13/08)
By Matthew Mosk and Jeffrey H. Birnbaum; A03
Sen. John McCain's top foreign policy adviser prepped his boss for an April 17 phone call with the president of Georgia and then helped the presumptive Republican presidential nominee prepare a strong statement of support for the fledgling republic. The day of the call, a lobbying firm partly owned by the adviser, Randy Scheunemann, signed a $200,000 contract to continue providing strategic advice to the Georgian government in Washington.

On Georgia Crisis, McCain's Tone Grows Sharper (Washington Post 8/13/08)
By Michael D. Shear and Alec MacGillis; A03
Aides to Republican Sen. John McCain were scrambling last Thursday morning even as his plane was descending into Des Moines. Russia had escalated its aggression in the bordering Republic of Georgia, they told reporters, and McCain wanted to seize the moment. ... Since then, McCain's rhetoric has become increasingly sharp. On Tuesday, he called Russia an unrepentant combatant against a "brave little nation" and compared Russian "killing" in the "tiny little democracy" to Soviet aggression during the Cold War era.

... While virtually every other world leader called for calm in Georgia last Thursday morning, John McCain did something he's done many times over his career in public life: He condemned Russia. ...What remains to be seen is whether the endgame to the Georgia crisis makes McCain seem prophetic or headstrong and whether his muscular rhetoric plays a role in defining for voters the kind of commander in chief he would be.

...The group, called Republicans for Obama, is led by two moderate Republicans -- James Leach, a former U.S. representative from Iowa, and Lincoln Chafee, a former U.S. senator from Rhode Island -- along with Rita Hauser, a prominent fund-raiser for President George W. Bush.Their reasons for crossing party lines are diverse, ranging from the war in Iraq to overspending in Washington, and signal unhappiness not just with the candidacy of Republican Sen. John McCain, but with the Republican Party as a whole.

Sen. John McCain reminded Pennsylvanians Tuesday that presumptive Democratic presidential nominee Sen. Barack Obama said the state's small-town voters "cling to guns and religion" because they are "bitter," a gaffe that possibly contributed to Mr. Obama's loss in the state primary and might haunt his general election campaign in this battleground.

McCain Pa. Tour Skips Iconic Three Mile Island, Harley Plant (Washington Post blog 8/12/08)
By Robert Barnes
Sometimes, the most convenient photo op for a campaign is politically inconvenient. And so it was that on his two-day trip through Pennsylvania, Sen. John McCain's campaign plane yesterday banked over the iconic cooling towers of the Three Mile Island nuclear plant and landed in nearby Harrisburg with no thought of a side trip. [Though] McCain pushes for increased nuclear power each time he talks about the nation's energy woes, the nation's most recognizable plant -- and site of its most significant nuclear accident -- would have been a poor place to make the argument.

Today, the Government Accountability Office (GAO) released a study on taxes paid by corporations. In what Sen. Byron L. The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Clinton laughs it up in surprise 'Colbert Report' appearance"

By Justin Sink

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton made a surprise appearance on The Colbert Report on Tuesday, engaging the late-night show host in a marathon name-dropping session in a bid to promote her latest memoir.

Colbert, who plays a satirically conservative pundit, had criticized Clinton for the sheer number of celebrities and political figures featured in the pages of her book, which chronicles her time as Secretary of State.

The comedian bragged he spent time with celebrities, too, noting that he had met actor George Clooney.

“Oh, I love George,” Clinton shot back. “I wish you could have joined us when we had lunch with Meryl Streep and Ecuadorian president Rafael Correa.”

Colbert shot back that he had gone camping with fellow television personality Oprah Winfrey.

“Oh?” Clinton responded.

“Oh, does that surprise you?” Colbert retorted.

Clinton, laughing throughout the spot, was also able to match Colbert’s trump card — having taped a full episode of his show with President Bill Clinton.

"I hate to break this two you Stephen, but I've met him too," Clinton joked of her husband.

The segment — which saw Clinton field questions about if she would rather fight a horse-sized duck or 100 duck-sized horses — was a rare moment of levity for the former first lady, widely considered the front runner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016.

When she appeared earlier this summer on the Daily Show, which precedes Colbert on Comedy Central, host Jon Stewart pressed her on a possible run.

“I think I speak for everybody when I say nobody cares they just want to know if you are running for president,” Stewart joked.

During that appearance, Clinton did joke she preferred a “home office” and preferably one with “fewer corners.”

New York Magazine blog: Daily Intelligencer: “Hillary Clinton Was Surprisingly Funny in Her Unannounced Colbert Report Appearance”

By Margaret Hartmann

August 6, 2014, 3:40 a.m. EDT

While we thought Hillary Clinton's book tour was finally over, on Tuesday night she turned up on late night again for a name-dropping contest with Stephen Colbert. The appearance was a surprise, and not only because Clinton showed up four minutes into the show and left before Colbert's scheduled interview with director James Cameron. Clinton tried to look like she was having a good time during her lengthy Daily Show interview last month, but she was funnier and more natural on Colbert, though the material was outside her comfort zone. Clinton is the rare human being who can easily give a long-winded answer on how to achieve peace in the Middle East, but Colbert had her do a scripted skit in which she attempted to resolve the "eternal question" of whether it's preferable to fight one horse-sized duck or one hundred duck-sized horses.

Clinton emerged as Colbert declared that her book is just "656 pages of shameless name dropping," and the two tried to one-up each other about hanging out with the likes of Bono and Oprah. "I will have you know, madam, I once did an entire show with president Bill Clinton," Colbert declared. "I hate to break this to you, but I've met him too," Clinton quipped.

Next, Colbert accused Clinton of failing to address any real "hard choices" in the book (mercifully, the book's title was referenced less than a dozen times). Clinton admitted that Colbert had a "valid question" about which bizarrely-sized animal to do battle with. She explained how she'd "find common ground between ducks and horses" in a goofy answer that worked about as well as an elaborate old McDonald's farm joke can.

Of course, not everyone was a fan of Clinton's comic stylings. In the ensuing thread on Reddit, one user complained that she never really answered the horse-sized duck question. Another lamented that political candidates shouldn't do silly late-night skits, saying, "I hate stuff like this. I feel like we have turned politicians into pop stars and now we vote for the cool people in hollywood rather than people who represent us well." If a skit this Reddity didn't win them over, Clinton definitely shouldn't let the internet ask her anything.

Politico: "Battle of the brag: Hillary Clinton vs. Stephen Colbert"

By Jonathan Topaz

August 6, 2014, 6:31 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton made a surprise appearance on "The Colbert Report" last night, jokingly sparring with host Stephen Colbert in a conversation about her new memoir.

The comedian began a segment on the Comedy Central show by criticizing the former secretary of State for bragging in the book about her personal and professional connections.

"This book is 656 pages of shameless name dropping," he said, while joking about Clinton's reflections on her personal relationships with various world leaders, including German Chancellor Angela Merkel.

"I just don't buy any of this. There is no way on earth one woman can be in so many places at once," he said, at which point Clinton came onto the set to applause and chants of "Hillary" from the crowd.

Colbert, who plays a conservative pundit on the show, yelled at his crowd for the warm reception for the Democrat, calling them "two-timers."

"Hillary Clinton," a faux-shocked Colbert said to his guest.

"Now who's a name-dropper, Stephen?" she replied, leading into a long name-dropping contest that invoked the likes of celebrities George Clooney and Oprah Winfrey.

"I once did an entire show with President Bill Clinton," Colbert ultimately said near the end of their game of one-upmanship.

"I hate to break this to you, Stephen, but I've met him, too," Clinton responded.

In the scripted segment, Clinton ultimately coaxed Colbert into promoting her memoir, “Hard Choices.”

Clinton’s summer book tour also led to a July appearance on “The Daily Show with Jon Stewart.” She continues to mull a potential bid for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016.

Time: “Hillary Clinton Drops In on The Colbert Report to Plug Memoir”

By P. Nash Jenkins

August 6, 2014, 6:07 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Lots of name-dropping, but still no talk of 2016

Hillary Clinton and Stephen Colbert went head-to-head in the name game on Tuesday night when the former Secretary of State (and U.S. Senator, First Lady, etc.) paid an unannounced visit to the Colbert Report.

“This book is 656 pages of shameless name dropping,” the faux-conservative pundit said of Hard Choices, Clinton’s recent memoir of her time at the State Department, just before she walked out onstage.

The two engaged in a lightheartedly schticky debate over which one of them is better connected in the world — Colbert hangs out with Tom Hanks at George Clooney’s place; Clinton once had lunch with Meryl Streep and the president of Ecuador — but the conversation pretty much stopped there. Clinton’s held a pretty ubiquitous media presence in the two months since she released Hard Choices, and she seems to be having fun with it, if only because every appearance on television or radio further flames the discussion of whether or not she’ll run for president in 2016.

Huffington Post opinion: Jeffrey Marburg-Goodman, legal counsel, former Obama Administration official: “Hard Choices in a Time of Extremism”

By Jeffrey Marburg-Goodman

August 5, 2014, 2:05 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] In a Time of Extremism, Extreme Competence and Perseverance Carry The Day

Hillary Clinton could not have known (could she?) when writing Hard Choices that in July 2014 the world would be in a virtual meltdown, with extremists of various stripes on the rise seemingly everywhere. Internationally, there is the dangerous nationalism and ambition for empire-rebuilding being carried out by Vladimir Putin, in ways both coherent and incoherent. Even more frightening -- because we understand it even less well -- are religious zealots and their state sponsors running amok across the Middle East. Meanwhile on the domestic front, extreme elements of one of our two principal national parties have caused dysfunction and the near-breakdown of our polity at a time of unique and pressing challenges: health care, immigration, and the nation's basic infrastructure, to name just three. On top of all this, the emergence of Ebola is a pile-on that, while hardly man-made, appears as a metaphor for a world that seems to have gone mad.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Against this backdrop stands the former secretary's book and, with August's arrival (and, if we are lucky, a quieter month of introspection and actual book reading), the chance to assess the strengths of extreme competence and steady-as-she goes perseverance that the author brings to once, and perhaps future, national challenges.

Here's what you need to know about Hard Choices, including some tips on how to address this worthy tome.

First of all, this reviewer discovered that the book is a much more interesting read than expected. While there is plenty here for policy wonks, there are also gripping tales that have the quality of a page-turner. The lead-up to Osama Bin Laden's death in Pakistan, the rescue of Chinese dissident Chen Guangcheng in Beijing, that famous first flight from Malta into Tripoli, Libya (immortalized by a Hillary-as-commando meme that went viral), the president and secretary literally crashing a private meeting of dissenting world leaders at the 2009 climate change conference in Copenhagen -- these are all here.

But beyond these events, I was impressed by how very accessible this book is. Clinton's prose is simple and matter-of-fact, with complex issues explained in (mostly) plain language. While many Beltway-insiders may roll their eyes at facts and policy arguments they already know by heart, this book wasn't written only for them; rather it was written for Jane Q. Citizen, who reads to learn of recent history, and perhaps to gain insights into a future that may yet be. What Jane Q. will also find in Hard Choices are lesser known, but no less fascinating, foreign policy efforts and events that make equally riveting reading -- like the secret U.S. effort to negotiate peace with the Taliban, the secretary's heart-rending visit with women and children in Eastern Congo, and the extraordinary tale told to her by President Putin about how he came to be born(!)

On the "wonk" side there are real serious, cogent explanations of things you may not have quite understood before. This is an evidence-based book, so facts and statistics often come fast: like the fact that the United States spends less than 1 percent of its annual budget on foreign assistance (rather than the "28 percent" that resides in the popular imagination) or that "Secretary of State" is the addressee on each and every one of the millions of cables that come in to Washington from over 270 U.S. embassies and consulates around the world every year -- and that only a tiny, tiny fraction of these ever reach the secretary's own desk (therefore debunking the misinformation spread by political opponents that the secretary was directly apprised of the Libyan security situation, pre-Benghazi). Among many other subjects, Clinton explains the pragmatism that lay behind the Russian "reset" and, in detail, why the reset did not mean capitulation -- far from it.

While it's notable that Clinton abstains from using this book to settle old scores, she includes careful explanations of events and decisions small and large that may have caused head-scratching -- or outright dissent -- at the time they happened. For example, instead of squarely laying at least some responsibility for Benghazi's inadequate security at Congress' doorstep, Clinton merely alludes rather softly to her "four years making the case to Congress that adequately funding our diplomats and development experts was a national security priority" at a time of shrinking Congressional appropriations.

Clinton also acknowledges her mistake -- in the plainest language possible -- on the subject of her 2002 vote authorizing President Bush to wage war in Iraq, yet also lets us fully understand the context of that vote: one in which a strong majority of then-sitting senators voted "yes" with Clinton on a bill that, by its terms, instructed the president (not yet known, in 2002, for waging preemptive wars) to 'use diplomacy before using force' and 'not to wage war unless U.S. national security is at stake.'

Perhaps most importantly for this book, there is heart, soul and emotion. Clinton saves some of the most expansive, lofty language for her worldwide, and life-spanning, efforts on behalf of women and girls, and this reviewer was especially heartened by all the space she devotes to perhaps the final frontier of international human rights: the plight of LGBT people in the developing world, starting with her description of the first time she uttered the words, at a State Department Pride event, "human rights are gay rights and gay rights are human rights, once and for all."

A couple of parting tips on how to read Hard Choices, especially if you find its telephone book size to be daunting: you don't have to read it cover to cover. The book is organized like a marvelous worldwide travelogue, so while I highly recommend that you begin by reading "Part One: A Fresh Start" (which contains its own share of riveting stories of the Obama-Clinton 2008 rapprochement that are new or newly told), proceed from there by dipping into the parts of the world -- or towards the end, the international challenges -- that tickle your fancy, and come back to the rest later on.

And, oh yes, about that last question you have for Hillary Clinton: will she run for president? Many have quoted the following language from the book's last chapter as a sign that she will: "Never rest on your laurels. Never quit. Never stop working to make the world a better place. That's our unfinished business."

But I prefer the following, from the epilogue:

“In the coming years, Americans will have to decide whether we are prepared to learn from and call on the lessons of history and rise once more to defend our values and interests. This is not a summons to confrontation or to a new Cold War -- we've learned painfully that force should be our last resort, never our first. Instead, it's an appeal to stand firmly and united in pursuit of a more just, free and peaceful world. Only Americans can decide this."

Clinton then continues by devoting a long paragraph to America's domestic challenges, including rising income inequality, deepening poverty in many quarters, and Washington's increasing dysfunction. And finally, this: "In the end, our strength abroad depends on our resolve and resilience at home."

July was a month when at least four separate wars raged across the Middle East and South Asia, an American Embassy was evacuated in North Africa, and a commercial airliner was shot out of the sky over Ukraine -- the deadliest such incident in history. Unfortunately, we can expect to look forward to more rather than fewer months like July. To battle feckless extremism wherever it arises, we need feral competence and discipline and perseverance at our helm. Whether by accident or by design, Hard Choices doggedly makes the case for the person to lead us who is best placed to deliver more democracy, more freedom and more peacefulness the world over -- and it doesn't hurt that this person has the biggest, most diverse rolodex on the planet.

The Star-Ledger (N.J.): "Hillary Clinton leads Christie for president in N.J., poll finds"

By Matt Friedman

August 6, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton would win New Jersey in a hypothetical 2016 presidential matchup against Gov. Chris Christie, according to a poll released today.

The Quinnipiac University survey of 1,148 New Jersey registered voters shows Clinton leading Christie in New Jersey 50 percent to 42 percent.

"As Gov. Christopher Christie traipses around the nation, his presidential potential seems alive, but former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, the adopted girl next door, easily beats him in his home state," said Maurice Carroll, assistant director of the Quinnipiac University Poll.

There is a bright spot for Christie, who is seen favorably by 47 percent of New Jersey voters and unfavorably by 47 percent. He does better against Clinton in his home state than the three other potential Republican presidential contenders tested.

Clinton would top former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush 54 percent to 34 percent, U.S. Sen. Rand Paul (R-Kentucky) 55 percent to 35 percent, and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee 57 percent to 34 percent.

And while New Jersey's women voters go overwhelmingly for Clinton 54 percent to 38 percent, men slightly prefer Christie 47 percent to 44 percent.

Just 39 percent of Garden State voters think Christie would make a good president, while 55 percent said he would not. At the same time, voters are split on whether Christie should run, with 49 percent saying he should stay home and 46 percent saying he should go for it.

New Jersey, which used to be a swing state, has been solidly Democratic in recent decades. A Republican presidential candidate hasn't won the Garden State's electoral votes since George H.W. Bush in 1988.

But President Obama — who easily carried the state in 2008 and 2012 — is not popular. At 44 percent positive to 52 percent negative, Obama's approval rating is, as Carroll put it, "in the swamp," and barely higher than his record low in October 2011.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New Jersey has produced two presidents: Woodrow Wilson, who was born in Virginia but became New Jersey's governor, and Grover Cleveland, who was born in Caldwell but moved to New York as a child.

If Christie does run for president, he may decide to resign as governor. And if he resigns, Lt. Gov. Kim Guadagno would take over for him temporarily.

Despite being so close to the governor's office, the poll found that most voters — 66 percent — don't know enough about her to say whether she would be a good governor. Of those who haved heard enough about Guadagno to form an opinion, 16 percent say she'd be a good governor, while 17 percent say she would not.

The poll was conducted from July 31 to August 4 and has a margin of error of plus or minus 2.9 percentage points.

MSNBC: "Hillary Clinton gets office upgrade"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

August 5, 2014, 7:53 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton has moved her personal office to a high-rise commercial building in Midtown New York City, a spokesperson for the former Secretary of State confirmed.

The entertainment website HollywoodLife.com reported Tuesday evening that Clinton had signed a two-year lease on the property, and cited anonymous sources saying the space will be the site of a future presidential campaign office. But Nick Merrill, Clinton's spokesperson, told msnbc that the space is the new site of her personal office, not a campaign office. The staff moved in last week.

Clinton currently has a small personal staff of less than a dozen, so the new space – which could fit about 25 people – leaves some room for expansion.

HollywoodLife did not list the address of the building, but a reporter for the site tweeted last week about running into Clinton in the lobby of the entertainment website's office building, located on 45th Street between 6th and 7th Avenues. The former secretary of state also has an office at her family's foundation, which is located nearby in Rockefeller Center.

Clinton ran her last presidential campaign from the suburbs of Washington, D.C., but some Clinton allies expect that if she runs again, she'll locate her campaign headquarters outside of the capital. New York would be an obvious choice, and the city is also vying to host the Democratic National Convention in 2016.

It would be highly unusual for Clinton to open a large campaign office so early, as it would effectively declare her candidacy. During her last run, staffers began working in a small space for a few months before moving to a larger office in the spring of 2007, after she declared her candidacy.

Clinton has previously said that she'll decide by the end of the year whether she will run for president in 2016.

WPRI-12 (R.I.): "Bill Clinton to campaign in RI for Seth Magaziner"

By Ted Nesi

August 6, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EDT

Former President Bill Clinton is set to visit Rhode Island later this month to campaign for Democratic general-treasurer candidate Seth Magaziner, WPRI.com has learned.

Clinton is scheduled to headline a rally for Magaziner on Aug. 27 at the Rhode Island Convention Center in Providence, a campaign source told WPRI.com. Magaziner is a political newcomer, but his family has close ties to Clinton.

Clinton's campaign stop will come just two days before the current Democratic president, Barack Obama, visits Newport to raise money for House Democrats.

Magaziner is battling former Treasurer Frank Caprio to win the Democratic nomination in the Sept. 9 primary. Ironically, the last time Clinton came to Rhode Island to campaign was in 2010 – when he came to support Caprio, who was then the general treasurer and the Democratic nominee for governor.

While the Caprio family has long supported the Clintons, the relationship they have with the former president is no match for that of the Magaziner clan. Seth Magaziner is already airing TV ads highlighting Bill Clinton's endorsement of his candidacy, and he met with Hillary Clinton when she signed books at a Seekonk Sam's Club last month.

Ira Magaziner, Seth's father, met Clinton when the pair were both Rhodes Scholars at Oxford and later served as a top White House adviser, famously working with Hillary Clinton on an unsuccessful health-care overhaul; he also masterminded Rhode Island's failed "Greenhouse Compact" plan in the 1980s. Ira Magaziner lives in Bristol and is now CEO and vice chairman of the Clinton Health Access Initiative, a Clinton Foundation project.

In June Caprio received the formal endorsement of the Rhode Island Democratic Party, which was chaired at the time by his brother, who has since resigned following controversy over beach-concession contracts. Magaziner has won the endorsement of groups such as the Young Democrats of Rhode Island. Labor unions are split between the two.

A third candidate for treasurer, former Auditor General Ernie Almonte, dropped out of the Democratic primary in late June and announced he would instead seek to win the treasurer's office as an independent in November; Republican leaders are tacitly backing him. The three candidates met for a one-hour televised debate on WPRI 12's Newsmakers last month.

A WPRI 12/Providence Journal poll in May showed Caprio with a double-digit advantage over Magaziner in the Democratic primary. The survey of 506 primary voters found Caprio in the lead at 29%, Magaziner in second place at 11%, and Almonte in third place at 9%. Nearly half of voters were undecided.

Magaziner finished the second quarter as the best-funded candidate in the race. As of June 30, Magaziner's campaign had $245,642 on hand, while Almonte's had $233,154 and Caprio's had $195,716.

Washington Post: "On Iowa tour, Rand Paul leans into a presidential run and attacks Clinton"

By Philip Rucker

OKOBOJI, Iowa — The worst-kept secret in all-important Iowa is this: Rand Paul is running for president.

Journeying this week on a 10-stop, 800-mile tour of the state that holds the nation's first presidential caucuses, the Republican senator from Kentucky has been bold not just in his rhetoric, but in his candor about preparing for a White House bid.

Paul is out-organizing his would-be 2016 rivals, building a network of loyalists in Iowa and other early-voting states while others lag behind and visit less often. He also sounds like a candidate, spitting out lines attacking Hillary Rodham Clinton, the potential Democratic nominee. He labeled the conflict in Libya "Hillary's war," and said the former secretary of state's handling of the 2012 terrorist attacks in Benghazi, Libya, should preclude her from becoming commander in chief.

Paul, 51, an ophthalmologist-turned-tea party hero, offered himself to Iowans as a Republican standard-bearer who could broaden the party's appeal to a diversifying electorate. "We should be bigger, bolder and better," he said at each stop — without being "wishy-washy" or "Democrat-lite."

But his vision of GOP outreach and inclusion clashed awkwardly with the party's reality Monday night at a lakeside tiki bar here in rural Okoboji, where Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa) held a campaign fundraiser.

Paul was eating dinner at a small table with King when a self-described "Dreamer" immigration activist introduced herself to them. Paul made a hasty exit — he left his half-eaten hamburger on his plate and was visibly chewing as he stood up — as Erika Andiola, the activist, questioned King about his opposition to immigration reform.

King told her, "You're very good at English," to which she appeared to take offense. Minutes earlier, the congressman had talked in his speech about a recent trip to the border in Texas: "I planted a flag right out there on the river across from the Mexicans!"

Paul, after extricating himself from the situation, talked with a handful of reporters about 10 feet away.

The moment underscored the difficulty that Paul and any other Republican presidential aspirant will face in building a diverse national coalition to win a general election, while also incorporating the party's more extreme elements.

The senator's rhetorical approach to the border crisis was to blame President Obama and focus on his vows to take executive action. "I frankly do think we could do some kind of reform, but you can't do it by royal edict," Paul told Republicans at a midterm organizing event in Council Bluffs. "You can't have a king doing it."

Paul came to Iowa to build relationships with key activists and test his message as he moves toward deciding about a presidential campaign early next year. It is Paul's 10th visit to Iowa in two years.

"I don't know why Iowa keeps popping up on my calendar, but it seems to be pretty frequent," he told reporters — a typical wink-wink comment suggesting that his candidacy is all but certain.

In an interview, Paul previewed how he would go after Clinton in a general election if he got the chance. He said her summer book tour has shown "how disconnected she is from the middle class."

"To make a comment about how woeful her finances were when she's worth supposedly between $100 million and $200 million — most of us, myself included, can't imagine that much money," he said.

Paul brought up the Benghazi attacks, saying he thinks Clinton did not pay enough attention to diplomatic security needs in Libya.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We want the most competent and wise of humans to be in charge of our military,” he said in the interview. “She made a big deal about the 3 a.m. moment with Barack Obama, that she would be the one to be able to handle the 3 a.m. call, but they were calling her repeatedly for six months and she wasn’t even picking up the phone.”

Paul went on to blame broader upheaval in Libya on Clinton’s policies, saying: “There are some who call Libya ‘Hillary’s war.’ She was all for it. … And if you look objectively at Libya now, it’s a jihadist wonderland there.”

A Clinton spokesman did not return a request for comment.

In his speeches across Iowa, Paul repeatedly attacked Clinton and tried to connect her to the Obama administration, drawing hearty applause from his crowds of Republican partisans.

“It’s sort of like the ‘Old MacDonald’ song — here a scandal, there a scandal, everywhere a scandal,” he said in Okoboji.

But Paul largely avoided talking about foreign policy in his speeches. His anti-interventionist views have been the subject of considerable debate among Republicans in Washington. Texas Gov. Rick Perry, a potential 2016 GOP primary opponent, has said Paul’s worldview would “endanger our national security.”

Some Iowans said they were intrigued by the senator’s potential candidacy, but questioned whether he is commander-in-chief material.

“There are a lot of things I don’t know about Rand Paul, like his foreign policy,” said Dan Dennis, 52, a business owner in Marion who described himself as a libertarian. “Right now, our foreign policy is so in the toilet we’ll need somebody strong in that area.”

In a state that prizes retail politics, Paul cut a reticent figure on the stump. He often seemed introverted and averse to the kind of glad-handing and back-slapping that is a favorite pastime of some of his potential opponents. But his oddities also help underscore the outsider, anti-Washington posture that many GOP voters find appealing.

On Monday, Paul began the day wearing a necktie featuring dozens of miniature profiles of former president James Madison, known as the father of the Constitution. Arriving in Okoboji’s kitschy Barefoot Bar, he changed into a rainbow-striped dress shirt.

“My staff’s like, ‘You’re wearing that?’ ” Paul told his supporters. “I’m like, ‘Well … this is my choice. Live with it. … This is the best party shirt I’ve got.’ ”

Republican strategists here said they are impressed with Paul’s organizing. He is working diligently to maintain the libertarian-leaning network of his father, former congressman Ron Paul (Tex.), who ran for president in 2008 and 2012, while also reaching out to evangelical Christians, fiscal conservatives and moderates. Two top Iowa operatives, Steve Grubbs and A.J. Spiker, are working with him.

Nationally, too, Paul has an early organizational edge.

“There are other people running for president, but they’re not organizing the way he is,” said Spencer Zwick, who was Romney’s national finance chairman. “I think some would regret that because they’re going to find themselves not organized and not prepared to run a full-scale primary campaign.”

When Paul stopped by a GOP office in Council Bluffs to help boost local candidates, Justin Levins, 37, came up to greet the senator.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Your filibuster last year was so exciting I went out and put on a [bumper] sticker, 'I Stand with Rand,' and I drove that car like 100,000 miles," Levins said.

"I appreciate that," Paul said, quickly turning to meet someone else.

Will the GOP establishment candidates kill each other?

BY JAMES HOHMANN

THE BIG IDEA:

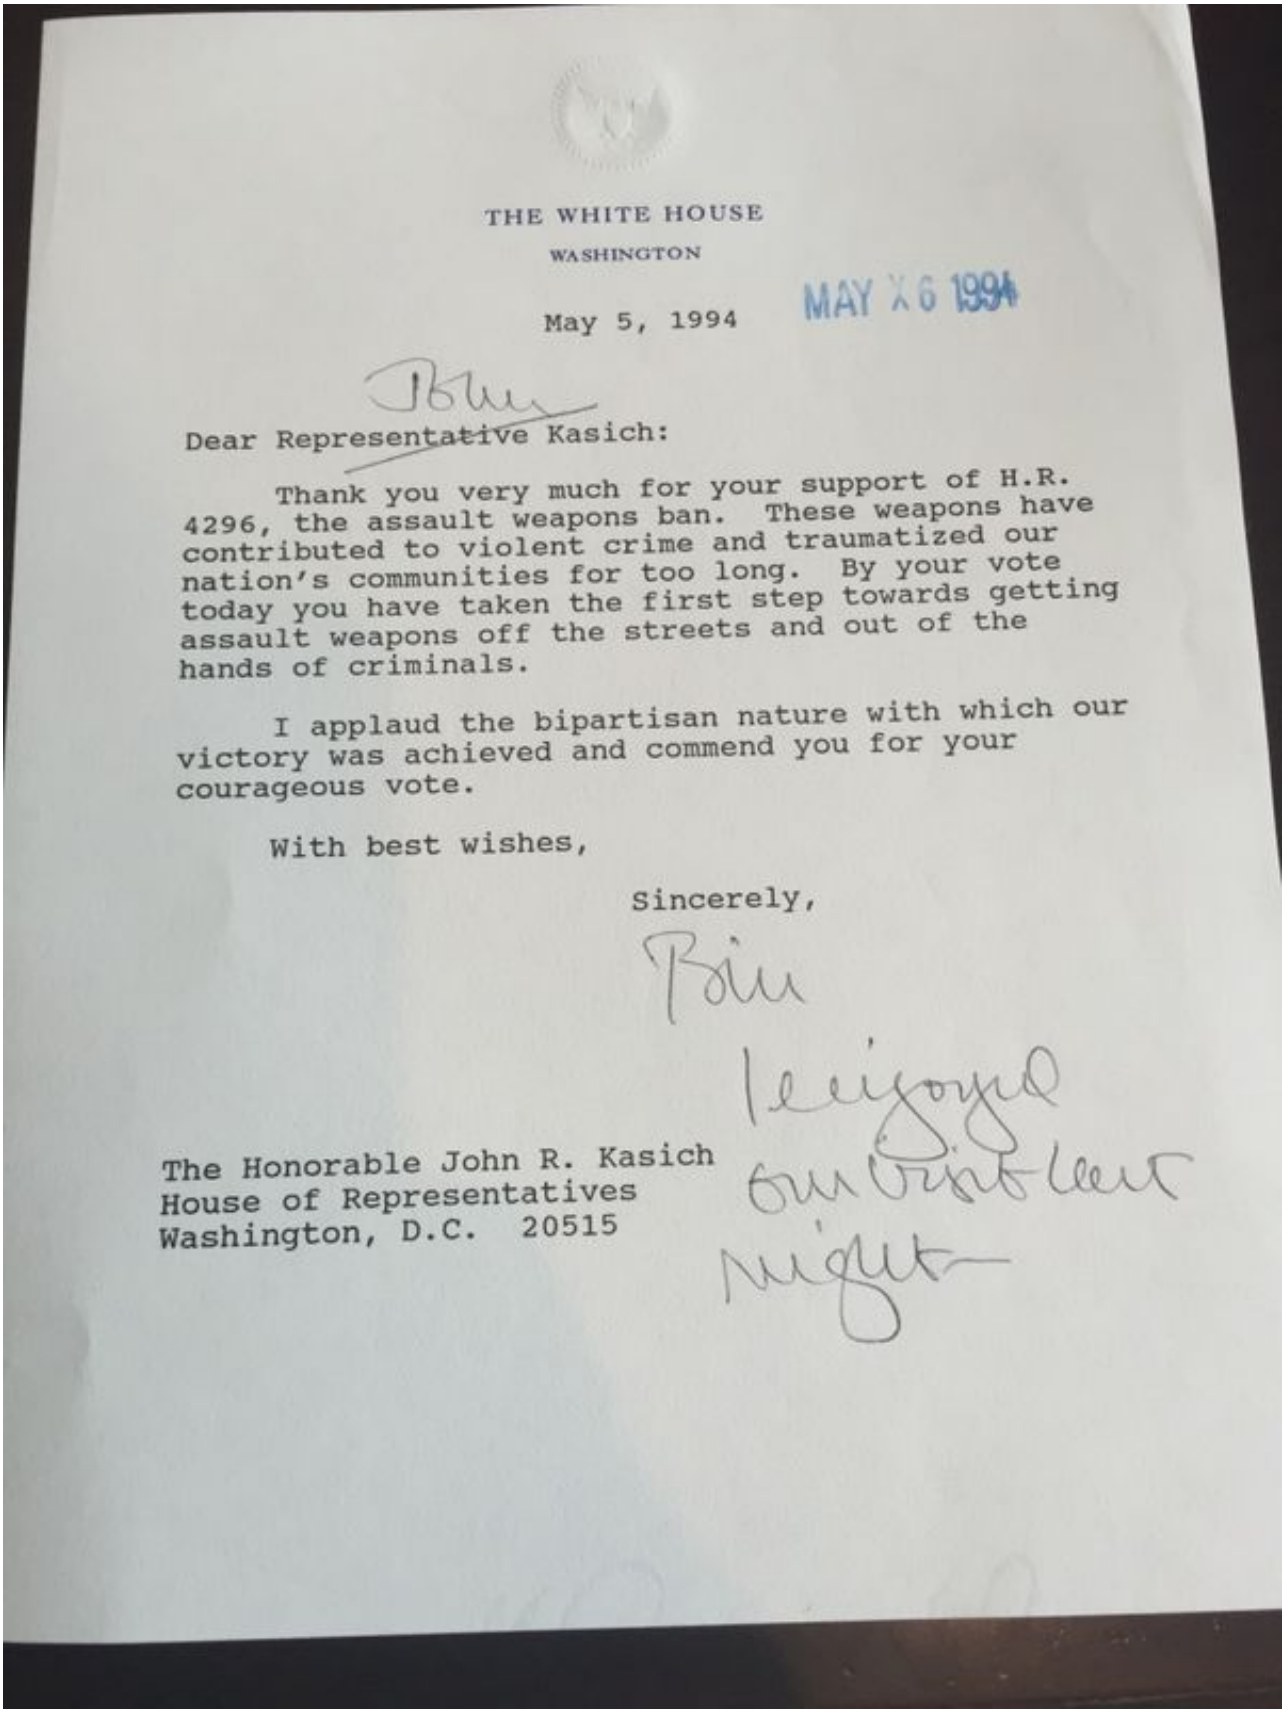
— The Republican nominating contest has entered a new, more desperate phase. The four GOP candidates vying to occupy the so-called establishment lane all turned on one other yesterday. Attacks that circulated for months on background flared up in the open.

"It's now down to the last five weeks here," Chris Christie told reporters in Iowa. "We need to make distinctions…"

The New Jersey governor then ripped into Marco Rubio for missing more votes than any other senator. "Dude, show up to work," he said in Muscatine. "Just show up to work and vote no. And if you don't want to, then quit."

Rubio, also campaigning in Iowa, fired back: "You know, Chris has been missing in New Jersey for half the time."

— That was one of the more memorable moments in a day that started as a Rubio pile-on but became a free-for-all. Jeb Bush's super PAC, Right to Rise, launched a $1.4 million ad buy in Iowa to highlight Rubio's absenteeism. The goal is to stop another Floridian from getting momentum in the caucuses that he could carry into the New Hampshire primary a week later. "Politics first, that's the Rubio way," the narrator says.



— Right to Rise also unveiled a commercial contrasting Bush with the two other governors in the establishment lane, Christie and Ohio's John Kasich.

— The super PAC supporting Kasich, New Day in America, responded that, "The country doesn't have an appetite for another Bush … As for Governor Christie, his mishandling of his state budget and the 'Bridgegate' scandal have earned him a 60 percent unfavorable rating from those who know him best — the people of New Jersey."

— Then Mike Murphy, the strategist behind the Bush super PAC, began tweeting out pictures of embarrassing documents that his opposition researchers had collected from an archive of Kasich's congressional papers. Among them: a 1980 thank you note from Phil Crane, the Illinois congressman whom Kasich backed over Ronald Reagan in the primaries, and a personalized letter of gratitude from Bill Clinton after Kasich supported the 1994 ban on assault weapons:

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

May 5, 1994 MAY 16 1994

Dear Representative Kasich:

Thank you very much for your support of H.R. 4296, the assault weapons ban. These weapons have contributed to violent crime and traumatized our nation's communities for too long. By your vote today you have taken the first step towards getting assault weapons off the streets and out of the hands of criminals.

I applaud the bipartisan nature with which our victory was achieved and commend you for your courageous vote.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

Bill

— More of the back-and-forth is captured in the story leading our newspaper this morning. GOP political consultant Alex Castellanos is quoted saying that the crossfire is beginning to look like "a 'Fistful of Dollars' gunfight," referring to the 1964 western starring Clint Eastwood. (Watch the scene Alex is referring to here ; read Karen Tumulty, Ed O'Keefe and Philip Rucker's story here.)

— Rubio has begun trying to position himself as the most conservative of the four establishment figures.

The campaign is pushing around a column in National Review by Jim Geraghty that ticks off his right-wing bona fides: "This is a man who has a lifetime ACU rating of 98 out of 100. A man who has a perfect rating from the NRA in the U.S. Senate. A man who earned scores of 100 in 2014, 100 in 2013, 71 in 2012, and 100 in 2011 from the Family Research Council. … Rubio's the guy who earned a 100 from National Right to Life in two straight cycles, and a zero rating from NARAL. He supports an abortion ban after 20 weeks, opposes exceptions for rape and incest (although he's voted for legislation that includes those exceptions), and opposes embryonic stem-cell research. … Rubio opposes gay marriage. … He opposes raising the minimum wage … He contends the legislative efforts to fight climate change are economically self-destructive and expresses skepticism that human behavior is driving climate change."

Ironically, the above could also be read as a list of reasons that Rubio would have a lot of trouble winning in a general election…

— Rubio is trying, to the extent possible, to stay above the fray: On the stump yesterday, he tried to brush aside attacks on his record as "par for the course," as his campaign released a barrage of surrogate statements decrying the attacks on his abysmal attendance record. His super PAC released a video highlighting nice comments that Jeb has made about Rubio in the past.

Today, Rubio's campaign will go on the air with an ad that presents the first-term senator as knowledgeable about and tough on foreign policy. "Today, we face ever growing threats: radical Islamic terror, a lunatic in North Korea, a gangster in Moscow, and a president more respectful to the Ayatollah of Iran than the Prime Minister of Israel," he says. "Our allies don't trust us. Our enemies don't fear us. And the world doesn't know where America stands. On day one of my presidency that will change."

— New Hampshire's primary may not have the winnowing effect that each campaign expects. David Weigel: "The four … are each counting on one or more of their compadres to fail. Until that happens, none of them are getting through the door. … New Hampshire sends only 12 delegates to the Republican National Convention. The history of people merely performing well there, then staying in the race until it's clarified, is as rich as the history of the state producing a nominee. … At some point, if Bush clearly has the money to last into March (as he says) and if Rubio is clearly in a stronger position to compete after New Hampshire, the 'nightmare' might be unavoidable. There are simply too many candidates waiting for dominoes to fall — and too many who can write off Trump votes as flukes." Dave calls this the Three Stooges Syndrome.

–– Donald Trump says, beginning next Monday, he will spend at least $2 million per week on television ads in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. The AP reports the first two spots will be about immigration and national security. "If somebody attacks me, I will attack them very much and very hard in terms of ads," the billionaire told journalists aboard his private jet last night. The buys have not been placed yet, though, and Trump has not always followed through on these kinds of pronouncements. He bragged last night on Twitter about how little he's had to spend for paid media:

> My campaign for president is $35,000,000 under budget, I have spent very little (and am in 1st place). Now I will spend big in Iowa/N.H./S.C.
> — Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) December 29, 2015

> So, I have spent almost nothing on my run for president and am in 1st place. Jeb Bush has spent $59 million & done. Run country my way!

George Pataki ended his campaign with a video message.

— George Pataki dropped out of the race for the Republican presidential nomination. David A. Fahrenthold and David Weigel note the former New York governor's campaign was doomed to fail from the start, that his liberal stances on abortion, guns and unions are very much at odds with a party that continues moving to the right: "Pataki announced the suspension of his campaign in a two-minute message that aired on NBC affiliates in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. He secured the free air time through an 'equal time' request made after Trump hosted 'Saturday Night Live.'" Pataki, who has not held office since 2006, had flirted with a presidential run in 2000, 2008 and 2012. When he announced in May, he declared: "My life has prepared me for this moment." He was wrong. When "Jeopardy " contestants were shown his picture a few months ago, none could name him.

Benjamin Netanyahu looks on as John Kerry speaks during a press conference at the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem. (Atef Safadi/Pool via AP)

— The Wall Street Journal reports that NSA surveillance of Benjamin Netanyahu and top Israeli leaders picked up their strategy conversations with members of Congress about how to torpedo the Iran nuclear deal. "That raised fears—an 'Oh-s— moment,' one senior U.S. official said—that the executive branch would be accused of spying on Congress," Adam Entous and Danny Yadron report. "Stepped-up NSA eavesdropping revealed to the White House how Mr. Netanyahu and his advisers had leaked details of the U.S.-Iran negotiations—learned through Israeli spying operations—to undermine the talks; coordinated talking points with Jewish-American groups against the deal; and asked undecided lawmakers what it would take to win their votes." Five nuggets from the piece:

- Obama ordered the NSA to stop spying on the presidents of France and Germany, but not Turkey.
- Obama was convinced for a time that Netanyahu would attack Iran without giving the U.S. a heads up, which prompted the order to step up surveillance.
- "Wary of a paper trail stemming from a request, the White House let the NSA decide what to share and what to withhold … 'We didn't say, 'Do it,'' a senior U.S. official said. 'We didn't say, 'Don't do it.'"- The NSA would also remove the names of lawmakers from intelligence reports.
- Analysts would pass details of intercepted communications to the top within six hours.
- Netanyahu was focused on building opposition to the Iran deal among Democratic lawmakers and confident he could win enough votes to stop the deal.

— Three Clemson football players were suspended after failing drug tests, taking them out of tomorrow's Orange Bowl against Oklahoma. "Deon Cain, Ammon Lakip and Jay McCullough have been sent home from the site of the College Football Playoff semifinal," USA Today reports . "Cain is a freshman wide receiver who is tied for third on the team in receptions. Lakip, a senior kicker, had a three-game suspension earlier this season after a spring arrest for cocaine possession and DUI. McCullough, a junior tight end, has no receptions this season for the undefeated and top-ranked Tigers."

— Four on-duty Secret Service agents were involved in a head-on car collision that killed one-person in Wakefield, N.H., the Associated Press reports. "Police said the agents were passengers in a Ford Taurus heading south on Route 16. A northbound Mercury Sable with three people crossed over the center line and collided head-on into the Taurus." Hillary was campaigning in nearby Berlin.

Abdulaziz Moallin, a co-owner of the Juba Cafe, a coffee shop popular among local Somalis, stands in the wreckage of the restaurant after it was burned in an act of arson on the night Trump announced a plan to bar Muslims from entering the country. The restaurant is now closed until repairs are made. (Photo by Andrew Cullen/For the Washington Post)

NASTY RHETORIC HAS NASTY CONSEQUENCES. A few hours after Trump called for temporarily stopping Muslims from entering the U.S., someone in North Dakota drove by a Muslim-owned restaurant and tossed a 40-ounce Bud Light container filled with gasoline inside.

That incident is the lead anecdote in this piece –> "Trump's effect on Muslim migrant debate reverberates in heartland," by Robert Samuels in Grand Forks: "Residents, descended mostly from Norwegian Lutherans, were accustomed to coexisting with the Muslim refugees who have settled in town over the past decade. But a confection of events far beyond the city limits … has made both sides increasingly fearful of their neighbors. After fleeing a decade-long war and remaking their lives in a peaceful, quiet community, Somalis feel they are being looked at with unfair suspicion. Many locals, meanwhile, have questioned whether the government is spending too much money on a group they think shows little interest in assimilation. And they find themselves wondering whether the people wearing unusual garb and speaking a foreign language will produce a jihadist killer."

Ted Cruz (Andrew Harrer/Bloomberg)

WINNING THE RELIGIOUS RIGHT –> "Ted Cruz huddles with faith leaders at ranch of super PAC donor," by Katie Zezima and Tom Hamburger: "Sen. Ted Cruz huddled with conservative faith leaders in Texas Monday and Tuesday as he coalesces the support of evangelical leaders behind his presidential bid. Cruz met with about 300 prominent faith leaders gathered at the sprawling ranch of Farris Wilks, who, along with his brother Dan, donated $15 million to a super PAC supporting Cruz. The event, sponsored by the PAC, was designed to introduce visitors to the faith story of the Cruz family. No cameras or recording devices were allowed at the remote ranch, where visitors enter through a massive stone archway with black gates, to protect the privacy of attendees and their conversation. … Those in attendance at the Monday sessions included prominent televangelists, such as John Hagee, pastor of the Cornerstone Church in San Antonio, and James Dobson, founder of the Focus on the Family organization. Richard Land, president of the Southern Evangelical Seminary and a longtime leader of the Southern Baptist Convention, was there, according to interviews with attendees."

A NEAR TOTAL LACK OF ACCOUNTABILITY –> "Spy agencies resist push for expanded scrutiny of top employees," by Greg Miller: "U.S. intelligence agencies recently fought off a move by Congress to require the CIA and other spy services to disclose more details about high-ranking employees who have been promoted or fired … The disputed measure was designed to increase scrutiny of cases in which senior officers ascend to high-level positions despite problems ranging from abusive treatment of subordinates to involvement in botched operations overseas. The CIA in particular has come under sharp criticism in recent years for promoting operatives who faced investigations by the agency's internal watchdog or the Justice Department for their roles in the brutal interrogations of prisoners…Under a provision drafted by the Senate Intelligence Committee this year, intelligence agencies would have been required to regularly provide names of those being promoted to top positions and disclose any 'significant and credible information to suggest that the individual is unfit or unqualified.'"

"But that language faced intense opposition from Director of National Intelligence James R. Clapper Jr. As a result, the wording was watered down by (congressional Republicans) this month and now requires Clapper only to furnish 'information the Director determines appropriate.' … Sen. Dianne Feinstein (Calif.), the top Democrat on the Senate [Intelligence] committee, had inserted the initial provision in the intelligence authorization bill that was passed by the panel earlier this year."

Jeff Weaver, campaign manager for Bernie Sanders (Yuri Gripas/Reuters)

— New York Times, "Top Bernie Sanders aide rankles those in and out of campaign," by Maggie Haberman: "When Senator Bernie Sanders's campaign team was about to address a throng of media about a breach in which his data director and at least two other staff members accessed Clinton's proprietary voter data, reporters and political watchers braced for some sort of apology. Instead, the campaign manager, Jeff Weaver, stood before the cameras and portrayed his campaign as victims of a voracious Democratic National Committee. He threatened to sue the party to restore access to its own voter file data. … The aggressive maneuver struck many political observers as daring. It caught Mrs. Clinton's campaign by surprise … But the person delivering the message, Mr. Weaver, is a long-trusted adviser to Mr. Sanders, who has developed a reputation inside and outside his campaign as a hard-charging operative often willing to go further than the candidate himself."

— BuzzFeed, "Trump defended Clinton during Lewinsky scandal against 'moralist" hypocrites In Congress," by Andrew Kaczynski and Megan Apper: "Donald Trump revived Bill Clinton's past marital indiscretions this week, attacking Hillary on Twitter and on TV for playing the 'women's card' and saying her husband's past affairs would be fair game. Trump took a different tact in the late '90s, when the scandal was at its peak, defending then-President Bill Clinton against the 'moralists' and hypocrites in Congress and arguing that the scandal wouldn't have been that bad if only Clinton had chosen to carry on an affair with a supermodel instead. 'I got a chuckle out of all the moralists in Congress and in the media who expressed public outrage at the president's immoral behavior,' wrote Trump in The America We Deserve. 'I happen to know that one U.S. senator leading the pack of attackers spent more than a few nights with his twenty-something girlfriend at a hotel I own. There's also a conservative columnist, married, who was particularly rough on Clinton in this regard. He also brought his girlfriend to my resorts for the weekend. Their hypocrisy is amazing.' Trump also wrote that Clinton should have refused to talk about his personal life … Trump at one point compared himself directly to Bill Clinton, telling CNBC in 1998, 'Can you imagine how controversial I'd be? You think about him with the women. How about me with the women? Can you imagine?'"

Trump defended his past comments last night, saying he was just trying to ingratiate himself with the powerful. "As a world-class businessman, you have to get along with everybody," he said. "I was able to get along with Clinton, I was able to get along with virtually every politician you can imagine." (Abby Phillip's story)

— The Atlantic, "The Iowa caucus gets an upgrade, " by Russel Berman: "Caucus Night 2012 was not exactly a banner evening for the Republican Party of Iowa. Reporting problems plagued the vote-counting during the crucial first-in-the-nation presidential contest. … Needless to say, the Iowa GOP would like to have a smoother—and more accurate—election on February 1 … The parties are pinning their hopes on new technology, betting that a custom-designed mobile platform can modernize a quirky voting method and ensure the public knows which candidates won Iowa long before voters head to the polls in New Hampshire. The idea is to meld 'a brand-new technology and a 100-year-old process,' said Stan Freck, senior director for campaigns and elections at Microsoft, which partnered with the parties on the project. … The key features of the app designed by Microsoft and its partner, Interknowlogy, are backstops for clumsy-fingered or tech-challenged precinct captains. 'It's a simple, big-button kind of interface, not a lot of crazy stuff on the screen,' Freck said. A demo confirmed his description; a precinct captain only has to go through a couple of screens after logging in, and the whole process should take no more than a few minutes."

Dear Friends:

Last Friday, the Confederate Flag was lowered on the State House grounds in Columbia, South Carolina.

Next Monday, the Cuban Flag will be hung in the State Department lobby and wave over the building in Washington that will once again serve as Cuba's embassy.

The same day, the flag of the United States of America will be hoisted in Havana at the newly-reconstituted U.S. embassy, with a formal flag-raising by Secretary of State John Kerry to follow later in the summer.

In these weeks, flags - so often invoked as symbols of resilience or an unchanging national character - represent the capacity of nations and their people to grow and change.

It took a while. For sixteen years after President Eisenhower closed our embassy in Havana and severed diplomatic relations with Cuba, an aggressive U.S. policy to reverse the Cuban revolution was frozen in the amber of its own ineffectiveness.

President Jimmy Carter, who wrote in a National Security Directive issued in 1977, "I have concluded that we should attempt to achieve normalization of our relations with Cuba," tried to see past the Cold War into a future where diplomacy would heal the breach between our countries opened by the Cold War.

Under his direction, an agreement between the U.S. and Cuba resulted in the opening of Interests Sections in their respective capitals, which Carter hoped would soon evolve into embassies, if the bilateral relationship could be righted under his leadership.

But neither the Cuban reality nor U.S. domestic politics would align with Carter's hopeful vision, and so his dream of restoring full and formal diplomatic relations waited another thirty-seven years to be realized.

Those of us who came to work on the Cuba issue more recently should acknowledge the debt we owe public servants like President Carter and Ambassador Wayne Smith , and to the experts and activists who worked over the decades, and the people we once called "moderate" Cuban Americans - they are the mainstream now, but sacrificed much to get there - so we could all see this new day arrive.

Their spirits never flagged.

Thanks to them, we now see history as if it were on fast-forward; Presidents Obama and Castro restoring diplomatic relations, freeing prisoners, sitting together at the Summit of the Americas, and opening reciprocal opportunities for travel and trade. The people of Cuba and the United States are seeing the same changes we are, and like what they

We expect to see tough negotiations ahead over real differences on human rights and on U.S. programs that continue to press for regime change in Cuba. But we never expected to see the Cuban National Assembly live tweeting reactions to a Castro speech about forging a new kind of relationship with the United States.

History isn't just on fast-forward; in 2015, it is moving at warp speed.

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS

Congressional sources say U.S. to upgrade Cuba's status on human trafficking list

According to Congressional sources, the U.S. State Department plans to upgrade Cuba's status on its annual Human Trafficking report. Reuters says Cuba will be moved from Tier 3, considered the worst offenders, to the Tier 2 Watch List. The State Department has declined to comment on the forthcoming report until it is finalized and released.

The State Department is required by the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000 to compile a human trafficking report annually, "with respect to the status of severe forms of trafficking in persons."

Nations covered by the report are rated and placed into four categories: Tier 1 countries, whose governments fully comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act's (TVPA) minimum standards; Tier 2 countries, whose governments do not fully comply with the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

TVPA's minimum standards, but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards; Tier 2 Watch List countries, whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards, but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards, and may still have problems like lack of evidence of their efforts to combat trafficking; and Tier 3 countries, whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

Cuba was not listed in years 2001 and 2002, but began appearing as a Tier 3 nation in 2003 . Tier 3 countries can be subject to U.S. economic sanctions, though Cuba remains subject to a comprehensive trade embargo codified by the 1996 Helms-Burton Act. As with its now-lapsed designation as a state sponsor of terror (1982-2015), Cuba has fiercely rejected claims of the U.S. government that the nation engages in trafficking and voiced resentment that it was stigmatized accordingly.

Josefina Vidal, the Cuban Foreign Ministry's Director General for the United States, and Cuba's lead negotiator in the diplomatic talks, condemned Cuba's continuing inclusion on the list last year:

> "The Cuban government rejects categorically as unfounded this unilateral move offending our people. . . Cuba has not requested the U.S. assessment, nor needed recommendations from the United States, a country with the gravest problem on trafficking children and women in the world."

Last year's report cited continuing concerns over sex trafficking, including of minors between the age of 16 (the age of consent in Cuba) and 18. The 2014 report also noted:

> "There have been allegations of coerced labor with Cuban government work missions abroad; the Cuban government denies these allegations. . . Reports of coercion by Cuban authorities in this program do not appear to reflect a uniform government policy of coercion; however, information is lacking."

Should Cuba's status be upgraded, it could join Bolivia, China, and Jamaica, as well as U.S. allies Panama and Qatar, who were designated Tier 2 Watch List nations in 2014.

At the second round of high level bilateral talks last February in Washington, negotiators agreed to include human trafficking on their agenda for future talks.

Cubans rush to U.S. shores before easy entry ends

USA Today examines the uptick in Cuban emigration to the U.S. amid fears that the policy favoring fast-track citizenship for Cubans is in jeopardy, as we have previously reported.

The 1966 CAA grants fast-track citizenship to Cuban immigrants who make it to the U.S. without being intercepted by U.S. authorities under the so-called "wet foot, dry foot" policy. Authorities in the U.S. have publicly stated that the CAA has not been changed under the new policy direction, but this has not stopped many Cubans from attempting the journey.

Cubans, such as horseshoe maker Duniseky Alvarez, are increasingly choosing to make the dangerous journey across the Florida Straits on makeshift boats, motivated by rumors that the Cuban Adjustment Act (CAA) would be changed as relations normalize with the U.S.

According to projections by USA Today, 2,485 Cubans will be intercepted by the U.S. Coast Guard in the Florida Strait before reaching land in 2015. This compares to a recent high of 2,059 in 2014 and 422 in 2010.

Embargo supporters such as Senator Marco Rubio (FL) have said that the CAA should be reexamined to focus on political refugees, and not apply to Cubans seeking greater economic opportunities. This view is shared by Jaime Suchlicki, director of the Institute for Cuban and Cuban-American Studies at the University of Miami, who argues that the law should "be strictly for people that are involved in political activities against the Cuban government, the dissidents."

Ric Herrero, executive director of CubaNow, contends that it is "immoral to tell the Cuban people that we are going to close the door on them coming to the United States, while at the same time keeping a policy that tries to strangle their economy."

The CAA is an anomaly in U.S. policy. Miami immigration attorney Ira Kurzban points out that there is no precedent for such a specific preferential treatment policy, and believes that the persistence of the CAA is rooted in the political clout of Cubans who fled Fidel Castro's Revolution and settled in Miami.

This is some cause for mixed emotions among Cubans as well. Duniseky Alvarez, a recent Cuban immigrant stated, "If we're going to have normal relations, they should get rid of [the CAA]. But there are so many people back there who want to do exactly what I did. I just don't know."

New Cuba PAC posts strong fundraising haul

New Cuba PAC, a new Political Action Committee launched in May to support normalization of relations between the U.S. and Cuba, has raised $178,000 in its first three months, reports the Wall Street Journal.

This compares with the $200,000 reportedly raised by the pro-sanctions U.S.-Cuba Democracy PAC over the two first quarters of 2015 combined. Although the U.S.-Cuba Democracy PAC has dominated political fundraising around Cuba policy since 2004, the figures suggest that New Cuba PAC could match or even outraise its more established rival in its very first year.

"This is something that's been missing for a long time," noted New Cuba PAC director James Williams. "When we approached it, the hard liner, pro-embargo side was incredibly skeptical and with this filing it shows they were wrong. People who care about this issue put their money where their mouth is."

Mauricio Claver-Carone, who serves on the U.S.-Cuba Democracy PAC's Board of Directors, says he's not worried about being out-raised by the new pro-normalization PAC. "At the end of the day what's important when it comes to political fundraising is consistency and reliability. Over the past 10 years we've raised nearly $5 million."

According to data available on the Federal Election Committee website, Claver-Carone's pro-embargo PAC figures peaked in the 2006 and 2008 election cycles at more than $800,000 raised in each two-year period, but those figures have trended downward over the last three election cycles, when it raised $636,000, $509,000 and $555,000.

New Cuba PAC's strong start could be a sign that recent policy changes initiated by President Obama have energized pro-normalization donors. Williams reported that half of New Cuba PAC's approximately 100 donors are Cuban American and include Manny Díaz, former Mayor of Miami.

Beltway firm seeks to drive U.S. settlement claims against Cuba to fore

The Center for Responsive Politics reports that Alexandria, Virginia lobbying firm Poblete & Tamargo has been hired to represent ten American families seeking to enforce property claims on assets seized by the Cuban government after the 1959 revolution.

These families represent a fraction of the more than 6,000 property claims recognized by the United States government with a cumulative value of between $7 and $8 billion (including interest and inflation). Many of the claims were made decades ago, but the recent detente in U.S.-Cuban relations has spurred renewed interest in pursuing compensation for seized assets; eight of Poblete & Tamargo's ten clients signed on with the firm since the December 17th announcement that the U.S. and Cuba would begin normalizing relations.

According to Roll Call , the firm's name partners Jason Poblete, who has caricatured President Obama's diplomatic opening as a 'surrender to totalitarianism', and Mauricio Tamargo, a former aide to Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, registered two years ago as lobbyists for Hon. John L. Loeb, Jr., a former U.S. Ambassador to Denmark under President Ronald Reagan. Loeb's father invested and later sold his company's holdings in Cuba's sugar industry prior to the fall of Batista.

The claims of Poblete & Tamargo's clients - and others similarly affected - could present a roadblock to restoring a normal relationship between Cuba and the U.S. Under the Helms-Burton Act passed in 1996, the United States is obliged to resolve claims of seized property before proceeding to restore full diplomatic relations with Cuba. However, some observers believe that Cuba's government will seek to reach a deal with the United States to shrink their obligations.

A number of Spanish individuals are also seeking compensation from the Cuban government for assets seized during the revolution. Jordi Cabarrocas, of Spanish investment firm 1898, represents clients claiming almost $2 billion in lost assets. Their case for compensation is considerably more complicated than Poblete's clients' case, due to a 1986 agreement in which the Spanish and Cuban governments agreed to forgive Cuba's debt in return for $40 million in compensation paid over a 15-year period, much of which was paid in tobacco rather than pesos or dollars.

IN CUBA

Cuba's economy grows by 4.7% in first half of 2015

Economy Minister Marino Murillo reported to the National Assembly Wednesday that Cuba's economy grew 4.7% in the first half of 2015, surpassing Murillo's previous estimate of 4% growth contained in a presentation to the Council of Ministers in November of last year.

Contributing factors cited by Reuters include growth in agriculture, particularly sugar, manufacturing, and construction. Although tourist arrivals in Cuba increased more than 15%, Reuters says that currency fluctuations caused earnings to lag behind.

Going forward, the process of U.S.-Cuba normalization is likely to drive export earnings through the increase of U.S. travelers to the island. Bloomberg reports a 15% increase in the number of tourists in the first five months of 2015 as compared to the same period in 2014. Several steps are being taken to allow Americans easier access to Cuba; last week, we reported that the U.S. government had given approval to Carnival Cruise Lines to enter the market, and today Spanish company Balearia announced it had been granted a U.S. license to run a Cuba-Florida ferry .

The expansion of U.S.-based cruise lines and airlines traveling to Cuba will likely accelerate the number of visitors to the island and further fuel Cuba's economic growth.

Mariel port and economic zone gain momentum as foreign firms set up shop

Although the Mariel port and surrounding Special Economic Development Zone opened in January 2014, it is only just beginning to gain traction and attract foreign investors, according to the Associated Press. Eighteen months after the port opened, seven firms have received approval to operate in the Mariel Zone, two of which are domestic Cuban firms.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ana Teresa Igarza, Director of the Special Economic Development Zone at Mariel, says that the pace of investment has finally picked up since a slow start, and that they are currently approving "almost one company a month" to operate in the Zone.

Currently, the only foreign firms represented are from Mexico, Belgium, and Spain; however, as we reported in June, the Alabama-based tractor company Cleber LLC is the first U.S. firm invited by the Cuban government to apply to operate in Mariel.

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS

Former IMF chief to advise Cuba on economic relations

Dominique Strass-Kahn, a former French finance minister who served as head of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) until a sex scandal forced him to resign his post, is planning to advise Cuba's government on its economic relationship with the United States, reports Politico.eu.

Following his June acquittal in a trial where he faced "aggravated pimping" charges, friends of the former IMF chief say he is positioning himself for a comeback, if not in French politics then at least on the international economic stage.

It is unclear what advice Strauss-Kahn might offer Cuba on engaging with the U.S., but he could be an instrumental advisor in a discussion about Cuba joining international finance institutions such as the IMF. Cuba exited the IMF in 1964. According to IMF historian William Broughton, Havana secretly reached out to the IMF in 1993, following the collapse of the Soviet Bloc, and with it, their primary source of financing. After several meetings, some of which included Fidel Castro and other high level officials, Cuba formally requested technical assistance from the Fund. The request was declined due to active opposition from the United States, as required under the embargo.

In a January 2015 article exploring the possibility of Cuba rejoining the IMF, Broughton explains that while the 1996 Helms-Burton Act requires the U.S. Treasury Secretary to vote against Cuba's re-admittance (unless s/he can certify that there is a democratic government in Havana), the U.S. does not have veto power over a simple majority vote of the IMF executive board. In the past, pressure from the U.S., which has a 17% voting share, would have influenced the outcome of a vote to readmit Cuba. Today, especially if the Obama Administration made clear that it would not actively oppose it, even while voting no as required by law, Cuba could very well gain re-admittance.

In his 2011 report for the Brookings Institution's Latin America Initiative, Richard Feinberg, a former economic advisor in the Clinton Administration and professor at the University of California at San Diego, also explored Cuba's possible re-entry into the International Financial Institutions. Feinberg spoke to a senior Cuban diplomat, who noted that, "Cuba has no principled position against relations with the IMF or the World Bank." In Feinberg's estimation, that choice of words was not an evasion; it was the Cuban equivalent of "an endorsement." If Cuba is interested in being readmitted to the IMF, it must submit an application. But even if it is not ready for full membership, Feinberg pointed out, it could always explore other types of ties, including technical assistance.

Cuba plans renewable energy projects with foreign investment

Cuba has set sights on foreign investment to finance a series of seven new wind farms, reports The Australian. The new wind capacity is to play an important part of Cuba's plans to generate 24% of the island's electricity using renewable sources by 2030. Currently, renewable energy represents just over 4% of the island's electricity production. Thirteen new wind facilities are planned to supplement four existing plants.

Reporting to the National Assembly this week, Energy and Mines Minister Alfredo Lopez said that increasing power generation from sources such as wind, photovoltaic solar, and hydroelectric plants could save $780 million annually. Cuban officials aim to attract $600 million in foreign investment.

Officials did not identify specific foreign investors in the new wind and solar projects; however, during his visit to Cuba last week, Italian Deputy Foreign Minister Mario Giro said that Italian firms are looking at several projects, including wind farms. Spain has also shown interest in renewable energy on the island.

While Cuba seeks to expand its renewable capacity, it is also still poised to explore offshore oil. Reuters reported this week that Cuban officials said that Angolan oil firm Sonagol would be ready to produce oil off Cuba's coast by 2017, if U.S. embargo restrictions were lifted.

President Raúl Castro condemns sanctions on Russia, criticizes NATO expansion into Eastern Europe

President Raúl Castro spoke out this week against the sanctions regime levied by the United States and the European Union on Russia, reports the International Business Times. Castro argued that the sanctions will "damage Europe, increase instability and bring new threats." He extended his criticism to the recent expansion of NATO's military presence in Eastern Europe.

The U.S. and EU sanctions on Russia were initially imposed following Russia's annexation of Crimea in March 2014, and include asset freezes and travel bans for high-ranking Kremlin officials. Economic sanctions have also been imposed, which the EU voted to extend through at least January 2016.

Nevertheless, Cuba's relationship with European countries continues to evolve following the diplomatic breakthrough reached between Presidents Castro and Obama last year, as well as the on-going normalization talks between Cuba and the EU. Frank-Walter Steinmeier will be the first German Foreign Minister to visit Cuba since German reunification in 1990, as reported by Politico .

Hillary Clinton is privately signaling to wealthy Jewish donors that — no matter the result of the Iranian nuclear negotiations — she will be a better friend to Israel than President Barack Obama.

But, even as donors increasingly push Clinton on the subject in private, they have emerged with sometimes widely varying interpretations about whether she would support a prospective deal, according to interviews with more than 10 influential donors and fundraising operatives.

Clinton's private responses in some ways resemble a foreign policy Rorschach test; donors who see a deal as important to world peace have come away thinking that Clinton shares their perspective, but so, too, do donors who oppose any prospective agreement as compromising Israeli security.

Publicly, she's expressed support for the negotiating process, which she secretly initiated during her time as secretary of state, but has also said "no deal is better than a bad deal."

With the talks heading into the home stretch in Vienna, the issue is emerging as an early test for Clinton's presidential campaign. She's already struggling to balance two of her biggest strengths as a candidate — her deep foreign policy track record and her vaunted fundraising ability — and that balance could become even trickier if there's a deal.

"Whatever way you go, there will be some people who won't like it," said Sarah Kovner, a prominent New York donor who is a leading bundler for Clinton's campaign and worked in Bill Clinton's presidential administration. "You can't have everybody with you. You've got to do what you think is right for the country."

The negotiations are of intense interest for some Jewish donors whose political giving is animated by their support for Israel. They're being counted on by Clinton's allies to donate huge sums for a campaign and a pair of supportive super PACs that, taken together, are expected to raise $2 billion or more.

Clinton's campaign rejected any suggestion that she's trying to have it both ways on Iran.

"Her support for the negotiating process and touting support for Israel are not contradictory," said Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill. "A strong deal is good for Israel in her view."

And several people who've heard her address the issue say the fact that different people can come away with such different interpretations is a testament to her nuanced approach to the issue and her skill as a politician, rather than any vacillation on the subject.

“That’s just smart politics,” said one donor who supports the negotiations and recently talked to her about them. “Because, right now, you have the freedom to say all those things, so why would you commit and box yourself in until you saw what the deal was?”

Clinton recently told another pro-deal donor that she was “very supportive of the negotiating process,” the donor recalled, while a third funder said she boasted of her role in starting the talks. “So it seemed like she was supporting it,” recalled the funder.

And, at a Manhattan fundraiser last week featuring a largely Jewish group of donors, Clinton defended Obama against charges he had weakened the U.S.-Israel relationship, asserting that such criticism stemmed from a “perception” problem, according to a donor who was present. But she also suggested that if she were elected president she could correct that problem and bring the two nations closer.

“Diplomacy is all about personal relationships, and I’ve got my own relationships,” she said, referencing her two-decade association with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, an ardent opponent of the Iran deal and, occasionally, of Obama. Clinton even cited her rapport with former Israeli ambassador to the U.S. Michael Oren, who last week published a book that was brutally critical of the Obama administration and was timed for release to try to stymie the Iran deal. “I know Michael well, but I haven’t read the book,” she said.

At a fundraiser last month at the Long Island home of Democratic donor Jay Jacobs, Clinton was asked by an Orthodox rabbi about threats to Israel’s security. “She did stress in no uncertain terms her full and fervent support of the state of Israel and the defense of the state of Israel,” recalled Jacobs. “And the people in the audience who heard it seemed to be comfortable with her answer.”

Likewise, donors at a different New York fundraiser seemed to fully accept her answer to a slightly different question about the U.S. interest in the deal, said billionaire hedge fund manager Marc Lasry, a leading Clinton donor. “She said ‘I’m going to do what’s in the best interest of the U.S.,’ and that was the end of it,” Lasry said.

Dan Berger, a Philadelphia lawyer and major Democratic donor who supports the framework of a deal, cautioned that the interests of the U.S. and Israel, “although close, are not identical. It might not be in the best interest of American Jews, but it’s got to be in the best interest of the majority of the people.” He urged Jewish donors “to take a step back and look at the complexity and judge the agreement based on its merits,” adding: “I’d hope Hillary would judge it based on its merits and not on political support.”

Lasry rejected the suggestion that Clinton would even consider the fundraising implications when assessing any deal.

But Clinton’s senior foreign policy advisers have briefed interested wealthy donors on both the negotiations over the deal and its prospects for congressional approval, according to one donor who recently talked to a top Clinton aide.

“It’s a tricky issue for her,” said the donor who was briefed, arguing that Jewish donors who oppose a deal and favor military intervention in Iran “are going to put her in a box.”

Clinton’s allies are carefully monitoring the sensitivities of a handful of hawkish Democratic mega-donors for signs that the Iran talks may be influencing their willingness to write million-dollar super PAC checks. Chief among that group is billionaire Hollywood entrepreneur Haim Saban, who sources say has spoken multiple times with Clinton and her top aides about the deal.

In April, he strongly suggested that Clinton opposed the deal. “I know where she stands, but I can’t talk about it,” Saban told an Israeli television news channel, adding under questioning, “She has an opinion, a very well-defined opinion. And in any case, everything that she thinks and everything she has done and will do will always be for the good of Israel. We don’t need to worry about this.”

He soon backtracked, saying “I have no idea what Hillary thinks about the Iran deal.”

And multiple prominent Jewish donors who joined Saban at a White House meeting with Obama in April to discuss the Iran negotiations said Saban expressed open-mindedness about supporting the deal, though one participant suggested his opinion shouldn’t hold as much weight as those of foreign policy professionals.

“Haim Saban is a very smart businessman who has a tremendous amount of love for the Clintons, but I don’t think he is the most sophisticated policy analyst that there is,” said the donor.

Saban’s representatives did not respond to questions about his interactions with Clinton.

But on Thursday, POLITICO reported that he donated $2 million this year to a super PAC supporting her presidential campaign, which Democratic finance sources interpreted as a sign that Saban’s financial support will not be conditioned on Clinton taking a certain stance on the Iran deal.

Steve Rabinowitz, a Democratic consultant who worked in the Clinton White House and was a co-founder of Jewish Americans Ready for Hillary, argued that the Iran deal isn't going to be a deciding issue for either donors or voters.

"Do people in my community talk about the Iran deal? Sure. But is it affecting their support for Hillary Clinton? No," he said. "Iran certainly will — and already has — become a talking point, but it will not move three votes or $3."

Clinton has the potential to bring along donors like Saban who might have been skeptical of negotiating with Iran, argued the Long Island donor Jacobs. "Hillary has a lot of credibility and support in the Jewish community. It's broad and deep. People understand that she has fought and has been there as an advocate," he said. "So when she speaks on the issue, there will be more people in the Jewish community who have perhaps unfairly not appreciated President Obama's support who will at least give her view a more open-minded assessment."

If Clinton backs any eventual deal, its proponents will be under pressure to step up their giving — both to the Clinton super PACs and to pro-deal groups — because she is likely to come under heavy fire from deep-pocketed groups that oppose the deal.

"If there's a deal, and she comes out in favor of it, you can be sure there will be a great deal of fire trained on her," said Noah Pollak, the executive director of the Emergency Committee for Israel. The conservative group has worked to rally opposition to the talks and this week began airing an ad pressuring New York Democratic Sen. Chuck Schumer, who is considered a key vote on the deal, to oppose it.

The left-leaning Israel advocacy group J Street, which has worked to build support for the deal, is expected to come to the defense of supporters, including potentially Clinton, though on some issues, the group's members regard her as too hawkish for their tastes.

"For people who speak on these Middle East issues on which we have strong positions, we come to their support and defense on those issues, regardless of party, regardless of candidacy," said Victor A Kovner, a Democratic donor who chairs J Street's PAC.

Kovner, like his wife, Sarah Kovner, is backing Clinton, and said he has communicated his support for a deal to the candidate.

"She is familiar with my view, but she has a lot of supporters and advisers on both sides of this question — around the nation, both within the Jewish community and beyond the Jewish community."

Main Topics: Russia, "The Obama Nation" book

Summary of Shift:

The Russian Georgian conflict remains to dominate political coverage. The release of "Obama Nation" fueled many discussions on the legitimacy of the book and its possible effects on the Obama campaign. Barack also received negative coverage for requiring DNC speech attendees to volunteer. With the DNC Convention nearing, several networks discussed the various planned speakers and rumors of Barack Obama's VP choice.

In other news, a shooting occurred at the Arkansas Democratic Party headquarters killing the State Party Chair Bill Gwatney. "Golden Boy" Michael Phelps continues to dominate the Olympics and media coverage. Controversy over the age of China's gymnastic team was also a hot topic.

Olbermann Blasts McCain On Randy Scheunemann, Conflicts of Interest, Inflammatory Rhetoric, Politicizing War
(MSNBC 8/13/08 8:12pm)

KEITH OLBERMANN: As war rages in Georgia, Russia's invasion of that tiny U.S. ally is raising new questions. Not just about the wisdom and competence of John McCain's foreign policy, but also about the integrity and the ethics that have shaped his position toward Russia. McCain's position may in fact have helped fuel this crisis. It certainly left today a foreign head of state making an extraordinary appeal for help from a capital virtually under siege and calling McCain out by name for not matching deeds to words. Our fifth story tonight the price for McCain's foreign policy possibly in this case a literal price. Did the nation of Georgia think it had bought John McCain. His rebuke at the hands of that nation's leader presently new details about McCain's top foreign policy adviser. On April 16th Russia announced it would establish legal ties with Georgia's two separatist regions, South Ossetia and Abkahzia, both friendly with Russia. Legitimizing them, a move widely seen as undermining Georgia' sovereignty there. The next day, the Washington Post now reports, Georgia sought help. Agreeing to pay $200,000 to a lobbying firm headed by this man, Randy Scheunemann to renew its contract with Scheunamann who is also and was also at the time McCain's top foreign policy adviser. That same day Scheunemann participated in crafting a strong statement by McCain taking Georgia's side, telling reporters quote we must not allow Russia to believe it has free hand. Did statements like that, purchased or not, give Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili to launch his military offensive in South Ossetia last Friday? Did it in turn become Russia's excuse for invading Georgia? Over the years Georgia has paid Scheunemann's firm $800,000. Scheunemann's company, the Associated Press reports today, has lobbied McCain and his staff on Saakashvili's behalf 49 separate times. With his capital under siege today, Saakasvili spoke like a man stuck only with a receipt. Asked about the U.S. response or lack thereof, he used the word appeasement and put at least partial blame for the crisis itself on President Bush […]

OLBERMANN: McCain responded this is no time to politicize the matter, even when it was pointed out he and his surrogate Joe Lieberman did exactly that just yesterday. […]

JONANTHAN ALTER: […] I do think it is really unseemly that Randy Scheunemann had this lobbying contract. It's always the second raters by the way who are foreign agents or lobbying for foreign governments- the top foreign policy people do it in a more subtle way, maybe they're consultants, they're not lobbyists. So this really stinks, the whole deal of him. Because you don't know who's he representing? Is he representing the interests of Georgia or the interests of the United States? And you never want to get into a situation like that and it's rather, I hate to say it, inexperienced maybe on John McCain's part to be putting up with this kind of thing. And also there's the question of whether in his rhetoric toward Putin, he's just been too inflammatory for American interest. […] The question though is one of subtly and moderation in one's approach to foreign policy. He's supposed to be the adult here. You know the mature foreign policy statesman. Those are the grounds on which he has asked us to elect him President. These are not well tempered measured remarks that he's been making. […]

CLARENCE PAGE: […] I'm just wondering Keith, how we would have felt if Barack Obama had said I speak for all of the people of the United States saying we are all Georgians now. That, some people would call that a little arrogant. […]

OLBERMANN: […] McCain said in the 21st century nations don't invade other nations. Do you suppose the irony of what he said was lost on Mr. McCain and does he assume nobodies going to draw the obvious parallel with his full support we invaded Iraq in 21st century and five years later we're still there?
PAGE: I think he's hoping we don't draw significance from it but I think we will. You just did. This is the kind of thing people are looking at in assessing John McCain.

McCain's Tough Stance on Russia Could be Due to Leftover Cold War Anger (CNN 08/13/08 8:23pm)
CAMPBELL BROWN: Some of the toughest talk about the Russian invasion of Georgia is coming from the campaign trail. Today Secretary of State Rice revealed that she has been in regular contact with both Barack Obama and with John McCain as this crisis unfolds. Now McCain of course, has been blasting the Russian's ever since the story broke last week and it has us thinking whether or not there might be something going on beyond the headlines, something a little more visceral for him. […]

TOM FOREMAN: There is no question that McCain has more hands on experience with Russia then Barack Obama does, and he's been presenting himself both as the voice of reason and of strength in this latest clash. But some foreign affairs experts are not buying it.

{Clip of Reagan]

FOREMAN: In the final years of the Soviet Union Ronald Reagan was thundering at the Russians, John McCain was a first term Senator cheering him on. And 21 years later he still distrusts Russia. […]

[Clip of McCain in Michigan]
JOHN MCCAIN: "And I am interested with good relations between the United States and Russia but in the 21st Century nations don't invade other nations."

FOREMAN: A tough line, especially from a supporter of the Iraq invasion.

JOHN MCCAIN: "The now Prime Minister of Russia, has been clear for a long time, that I've been concerned about Russian behavior in a broad variety of areas."

FOREMAN: And now listen to how this foreign policy expert is reacting.

CHARLES KUPCHAN: Well over the last few years McCain's views on Russia seem to be getting more and more confrontational. And I think he's really aligned himself with the far right, not with the centrist within the Republican Party and in some ways it seems almost that he either thinks the cold war is still on or wants it to return.

FOREMAN: McCain has been critical of efforts to reach out to Russia politically and economically, even those of President Bush. He has repeatedly attacked Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin, who is a former KGB boss.

MCCAIN: I looked into Mr. Putin's eyes and I saw three letters: a K, a G and a B.

FOREMAN: McCain wrote in foreign affairs magazine: "Today we see in Russia diminishing political freedoms, a leadership dominated by a clique of former intelligence officers. Efforts to bully democratic neighbors such as Georgia, and attempts to manipulate Europe's dependence on Russian oil and gas. " McCain has pushed to have Russia thrown out of the G8, that group of the worlds largest democracies formed to promote economic and political cooperation. He has fought to bring the Soviet Union's former republics into NATO, a military alliance of western powers formed to oppose Russia's military might.

KUPCHAN: I think it's arguably dangerous in the sense that by assuming that Russia may be more aggressive than it is, and by pushing Russia's back up against the wall, it's possible one can produce a self-proclaiming prophecy.

Dean Reynolds Discusses The New Tough McCain Campaign Tactics, Bush Style (CBS 08/13/08 6:40pm)
DEAN REYNOLDS: John McCain decried what he called partisan political sniping. [play clip]

JOHN MCCAIN: This isn't a time for partisan sniping between the campaigns. [end clip]

REYNOLDS: However the sharpest criticism has come from the surrogate standing next to McCain this afternoon. Attacking Barack Obama's stand on the crises as quote morally neutral, the sharper edge by his aides and the candidate is further evidence that the McCain campaign has changed. Gone are the bile green backdrops, and the hard to master teleprompter. [play clip]

MCCAIN: He has the audis-audacity to hope you don't mind. [end clip]

REYNOLDS: Replaced by splashier events, reminiscent of a previous Republican campaign for the White House. But it's more than staging, it's tone. The campaign theme is no longer reform, prosperity and peace. It's now Country First. What that means exactly was made clear Tuesday when an introductionary speaker framed the contest with Obama this way: [play clip]

JOE LIEBERMAN: Between one candidate, John McCain, with experience whose been tested in war and tried in peace, another candidate who has not. [end clip]

REYNOLDS: Remember, this was McCain months ago: [play clip]

MCCAIN: I pledge to conduct a respectful campaign. [end clip]

REYNOLDS: But now it frequently seems respect takes a backseat to ridicule. This attack [Hilton celebrity ad] ran during the Olympics.

KEN GOLDSTEIN: McCain ads are much more likely to be negative, and the Obama advertisements are much more likely to be positive.

REYNOLDS: And as often as McCain speaks out against partisanship, there was a broad Republican consensus that his tamer approach was not working. And that something new was needed. Something like we are seeing today.

Hardball Guests Discuss James Corsi Anti-Obama Book (MSNBC
RICH MASTERS: […] James Corsi is making no bones about it he wants to defeat Barack Obama. And for legitimate news organizations to give this guy any more credibility than what he deserves, is really really tough right now. It'd be almost laughable for a guy who has called Hillary Clinton a fat cow. This is a guy who fundamentally has no journalistic bones in his body. And the reason its number one right now is because there are a bunch of right wing think tanks and groups that have purchased this stuff to inflate those numbers so that we are talking about this right now. […]

DAVID SHUSTER: Charlie Black said the McCain campaign would make a different choice. Here's what Charlie Black said a month ago: "We don't want to talk about his patriotism and character, referring to Barack Obama. We concede that he is a patriot and a person of good character. That flies in the face of this book. […]

MASTERS: John McCain could have a Catholic problem right now. You've got Reverend Hagee who trashed the Catholic Church as the great Satan. Again, McCain didn't say one word about that. Now we've got this guy who again attacks Pope John Paul. I think John McCain needs to come out because McCain –these folks who are speaking maybe not on his behalf but he certainly hasn't disavowed this bunch of lies that is out there. Somebody has got to step up and say it and John McCain who is an American war hero, should have the courage to do what he did four years ago and condemn this pack of lies. […]

Shuster Notes McCain Hypocrisy For Working With Abramoff Connected Ralph Reed (MSNBC 08/13/08 7:30pm)
DAVID SHUSTER: Just a few years ago former Christian Coalition leader Ralph Reed was caught up in the Jack Abramoff lobbyist scandal. John McCain led a Senate investigation into the scandal, ripped the characters involved, and bragged about the people who are going to jail. Well, now it seems John McCain is now singing a different tune- at least about Ralph Reed. Reed is now a part of McCain's victory 2008 fundraising team. And Reed recently sent out an e-mail soliciting donations for McCain. Yes, if you want a politician to forgive and forget, help them collect some campaign cash.

Subject: MUST READ: Secretary Clinton Reviews Henry Kissinger's New Book

Washington Post opinion: Sec. Hillary Rodham Clinton: "Hillary Clinton reviews Henry Kissinger's 'World Order'"

By Sec. Hillary Rodham Clinton

September 4, 2014, 3:00 p.m. EDT

When Americans look around the world today, we see one crisis after another. Russian aggression in Ukraine, extremism and chaos in Iraq and Syria, a deadly epidemic in West Africa, escalating territorial tensions in the East and South China seas, a global economy that still isn't producing enough growth or shared prosperity — the liberal international order that the United States has worked for generations to build and defend seems to be under pressure from every quarter. It's no wonder so many Americans express uncertainty and even fear about our role and our future in the world.

In his new book, "World Order," Henry Kissinger explains the historic scope of this challenge. His analysis, despite some differences over specific policies, largely fits with the broad strategy behind the Obama administration's effort over the past six years to build a global architecture of security and cooperation for the 21st century.

During the Cold War, America's bipartisan commitment to protecting and expanding a community of nations devoted to freedom, market economies and cooperation eventually proved successful for us and the world. Kissinger's summary of that vision sounds pertinent today: "an inexorably expanding cooperative order of states observing common rules and norms, embracing liberal economic systems, forswearing territorial conquest, respecting national sovereignty, and adopting participatory and democratic systems of governance."

This system, advanced by U.S. military and diplomatic power and our alliances with like-minded nations, helped us defeat fascism and communism and brought enormous benefits to Americans and billions of others. Nonetheless, many people around the world today — especially millions of young people — don't know these success stories, so it becomes our responsibility to show as well as tell what American leadership looks like.

This is especially important at a time when many are wondering, as Kissinger puts it, "Are we facing a period in which forces beyond the restraints of any order determine the future?"

For me, this is a familiar question. When I walked into the State Department in January 2009, everyone knew that it was a time of dizzying changes, but no one could agree on what they all meant. Would the economic crisis bring new forms of cooperation or a return to protectionism and discord? Would new technologies do more to help citizens hold leaders accountable or to help dictators keep tabs on dissidents? Would rising powers such as China, India and Brazil become global problem-solvers or global spoilers? Would the emerging influence of non-state actors be defined more by the threats from terrorist networks and criminal cartels, or by the contributions of courageous NGOs? Would growing global interdependence bring a new sense of solidarity or new sources of strife?

President Obama explained the overarching challenge we faced in his Nobel lecture in December 2009. After World War II, he said, "America led the world in constructing an architecture to keep the peace. . . . And yet, a decade into a new century, this old architecture is buckling under the weight of new threats."

I was proud to help the president begin reimagining and reinforcing the global order to meet the demands of an increasingly interdependent age. In the president's first term, we laid the foundation, from repaired alliances to updated international institutions to decisive action on challenges such as Iran's nuclear program and the threat from Osama bin Laden.

The crises of the second term underscore that this is a generational project that will demand a commitment from the United States and its partners for years to come. Kissinger writes that foreign policy is not "a story with a beginning and an end," but "a process of managing and tempering ever-recurring challenges." This calls to mind John F. Kennedy's observation that peace and progress are "based not on a sudden revolution in human nature but on a gradual evolution in human institutions . . . a process — a way of solving problems."

America, at its best, is a problem-solving nation. And our continued commitment to renovating and defending the global order will determine whether we build a future of peace, progress and prosperity in which people everywhere have the opportunity to live up to their God-given potential.

Much of “World Order” is devoted to exploring this challenge. It is vintage Kissinger, with his singular combination of breadth and acuity along with his knack for connecting headlines to trend lines — very long trend lines in this case. He ranges from the Peace of Westphalia to the pace of microprocessing, from Sun Tzu to Talleyrand to Twitter. He traces the Indian view of order back to the Hindu epics; the Muslim view to the campaigns of Muhammad; the European view to the carnage of the Thirty Years’ War (which elicits a comparison to the Middle East today); the Russian view to “the hard school of the steppe, where an array of nomadic hordes contended for resources on an open terrain with few fixed borders.” This long view can help us understand issues from Vladimir Putin’s aggression to Iran’s negotiating strategy, even as it raises the difficult question of “how divergent historic experiences and values can be shaped into a common order.”

Given today’s challenges, Kissinger’s analyses of the Asia-Pacific and the Middle East are particularly valuable.

When it comes to Asia, he notes that all of the region’s rising powers, China included, have their own visions of regional and global order, shaped by their own histories and present situations. How we contend with these divergent visions — building a cooperative relationship with China while preserving our other relationships, interests and values in a stable and prosperous region — will go a long way toward determining whether we can meet the broader global challenge.

In my book “Hard Choices,” I describe the strategy President Obama and I developed for the Asia-Pacific, centered on strengthening our traditional alliances; elevating and harmonizing the alphabet soup of regional organizations, such as ASEAN (the Association of Southeast Asian Nations) and APEC (the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation organization); and engaging China more broadly — both bilaterally, through new venues such as the Strategic and Economic Dialogue, and multilaterally, in settings where regional pressure would encourage more constructive behavior and shared decision-making on matters from freedom of navigation to climate change to trade to human rights. Our “pivot to Asia,” as it came to be known, is all about establishing a rules-based order in the region that can manage the peaceful rise of new powers and promote universal norms and values.

This kind of methodical, multilateral diplomacy is often slow and frustrating, rarely making headlines at home, but it can pay real dividends that affect the lives of millions of people. And without an effective regional order, the challenges multiply. Just look at the Middle East. “Nowhere,” Kissinger observes, “is the challenge of international order more complex — in terms of both organizing regional order and ensuring the compatibility of that order with peace and stability in the rest of the world.”

Kissinger is a friend, and I relied on his counsel when I served as secretary of state. He checked in with me regularly, sharing astute observations about foreign leaders and sending me written reports on his travels. Though we have often seen the world and some of our challenges quite differently, and advocated different responses now and in the past, what comes through clearly in this new book is a conviction that we, and President Obama, share: a belief in the indispensability of continued American leadership in service of a just and liberal order.

There really is no viable alternative. No other nation can bring together the necessary coalitions and provide the necessary capabilities to meet today’s complex global threats. But this leadership is not a birthright; it is a responsibility that must be assumed with determination and humility by each generation.

Fortunately, the United States is uniquely positioned to lead in the 21st century. It is not just because of the enduring strength of our military or the resilience of our economy, although both are absolutely essential. It goes deeper than that. The things that make us who we are as a nation — our diverse and open society, our devotion to human rights and democratic values — give us a singular advantage in building a future in which the forces of freedom and cooperation prevail over those of division, dictatorship and destruction.

This isn’t just idealism. For an international order to take hold and last, Kissinger argues, it must relate “power to legitimacy.” To that end, Kissinger, the famous realist, sounds surprisingly idealistic. Even when there are tensions between our values and other objectives, America, he reminds us, succeeds by standing up for our values, not shirking them, and leads by engaging peoples and societies, the sources of legitimacy, not governments alone. If our might helps secure the balance of power that underpins the international order, our values and principles help make it acceptable and attractive to others.

So our levers of leadership are not just about keeping our military strong and our diplomacy agile; they are about standing up for human rights, about advancing the rights and role of women and girls, about creating the space for a flourishing civil society and the conditions for broad-based development.

This strategic rationale guided my emphasis as secretary of state on using all the tools of foreign policy, even those sometimes dismissed as “soft.” I called it “smart power,” and I still believe it offers a blueprint for sustained American leadership in the decades ahead. We have to play to our strengths. And in an age when legitimacy is defined from the bottom up rather than the top down, America is better positioned than our more autocratic competitors.

Kissinger recognizes this as well. He understands how much the world has changed since his time in office, especially the diffusion of power and the growing influence of forces beyond national governments. International problems and solutions are increasingly centered, in ways both good and bad, on nongovernmental organizations, businesses and individual citizens. As a result, foreign policy is now as much about people as it is about states. Kissinger rightly notes that these shifts require a broader and deeper order than sufficed in the past. “Any system of world order, to be sustainable, must be accepted as just — not only by leaders, but also by citizens,” he writes.

That is true abroad, and it is also true at home. Our country is at its best, and our leadership in the world is strongest, when we are united behind a common purpose and shared mission, and advancing shared prosperity and social justice at home. Sustaining America’s leadership in the world depends on renewing the American dream for all our people.

In the past, we’ve flirted with isolationism and retreat, but always heeded the call to leadership when it was needed most. It’s time for another of our great debates about what America means to the world and what the world means to America. We need to have an honest conversation together — all of us — about the costs and imperatives of global leadership, and what it really takes to keep our country safe and strong.

We have a lot to talk about. Sometimes we’ll disagree. But that’s what democracy is all about. A real national dialogue is the only way we’re going to rebuild a political consensus to take on the perils and the promise of the 21st century. Henry Kissinger’s book makes a compelling case for why we have to do it and how we can succeed.

Main Topics: Obama's overseas trip, National Security

Summary of Shift: Obama's overseas trip received was covered to the exclusion of almost all else today. While McCain praised the idea his communications director was quick to call it a "photo opportunity" and "overseas campaign rally." June was an exceptional fundraising month for both candidates. McCain and Obama raised $22 and $52 million respectively. Oil prices continued to go down as Al Gore made headlines today challenging the United States to use only renewable energy sources by 2018. Direct nuclear negotiations between top Iranian and U.S. officials are expected to begin soon. The government has taken the salmonella warning off of tomatoes but some types of green pepper may still be dangerous.

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: John McCain is again telling supporters he is the underdog in the race for the White House, a title Barack Obama is also claiming. McCain . . . told supporters at last night's fundraiser, quote, "We are the underdog. We are not taking the state of Nebraska for granted. I'm going to campaign here, and compete here, and I need your help. We need to organize. We need to get out the vote." Jill Hazelbaker is the communications director for the McCain campaign . . .

BRZEZINSKI: Your candidate, McCain, made this claim . . . last weekend and then again last night. What makes John McCain the underdog and is this position one he really wants to be in at this point? I mean, what good can he gain from calling himself the underdog?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

JILL HAZELBAKER: Well, Mika, as you know, we took a very unusual path to the nomination. John McCain always performs better when he's behind, when his back's against the wall. He's a fighter . . .

BRZEZINSKI: . . . he did have a time there when his campaign seemed like it was falling apart . . . he came back in a big way . . . Barack Obama, as you know, gearing up for his trip to Europe and the Middle East. Normally when presidents travel, critics back home lay off on the attacks but, in sort of an unusual move, the McCain campaign has unveiled a new video about Obama and Iraq . . . what is it going to say? And is it really going to focus on Barack Obama and specifically his trip?

HAZELBAKER: . . . first of all, I want to say that Barack Obama set the precedent for attacking your opponent when he was very critical of Sen. McCain while he was in a meeting with President Uribe in Colombia . . . we're simply following his lead. We think it's important that we set the record straight. There is a lot of hypocrisy with Barack Obama shifting position on Iraq and Afghanistan. On the surge Barack Obama . . . said it would never work . . . and of course that position has been proving wrong . . .

BRZEZINSKI: Your candidate, Sen. John McCain, mocked Obama's strategy just moments ago, when speaking in Missouri. Let's take a listen to that:

JOHN MCCAIN: I know that Sen. Obama is going to Iraq. I was very interested that he articulated and announced his policies on Iraq before he went. Not after. Remarkable. I've been on a lot trips around the world, usually at your expense, but I usually issue my policy statements when I get back.

BRZEZINSKI: . . . I've got to ask you though, is this a little bit of a low blow? Because for Barack Obama and John McCain, the argument has a lot to do with judgment about whether this war was the right thing to do in the first place. And Barack Obama, he falls in line with how a lot of people in the country feel about that if you look at some of the public opinion polls. How do, I don't know, how does your candidate at this point, counter the judgment issue and is going after the fact that he's going on a trip after he's written an editorial enough?

HAZELBAKER: Well, the Sen. McCain, of course, had the judgment and had the foresight to see that we needed a new strategy in Iraq so that question has been settled. John McCain was right. Mika, it is interesting that Barack Obama thought it was appropriate to lay out his strategy and his plan for the way forward in Afghanistan prior to getting on the ground . . . this trip is a political trip for him, it's one giant photo opportunity, it is not designed to inform his worldview.

BRZEZINSKI: . . . we were running on Morning Joe this morning that Planned Parenthood ad. I'm sure you've seen it. Talk to me about, where does John McCain stand on the issue because a lot of women might of thought, "Why didn't he have a quick answer for that?" You know?

HAZELBAKER: Well, Mika, I'm sorry, in politics today, there are a lot of gotcha games. Sen. McCain, he deals with it everyday on the campaign trail. We afford a lot of access to the news media, sometimes that bites you but it's at John McCain's core to be accessible to reporters like yourself. Let's hope that you can get on the bus with us . . . the campaigns about the big issues Mika, people are concerned about the economy, they're concerned about their safety and as you said, John McCain's in Missouri today, talking about how he can keep Americans working and how he can keep Americans safe.

BRZEZINSKI: You know, top McCain advisor, that would be Carly Fiorina . . . she met again with undecided Clinton supporters this week, as you know, describing these women as intensely uncomfortable about the notion of a President Obama. About 17 million people voted for Clinton in the primaries. How does your campaign plan to secure these votes?

HAZELBAKER: Well, Sen. Clinton should be congratulated . . . we have to reach out to these voters the same way that we're reaching out to people across the country. You know, Clinton voters are just like everyone else. They want safety, they want quality education, they want affordable health care . . . the good thing about a candidate like John McCain is he has a 25-year record of reaching across the aisle, of putting his country first, of working on a bipartisan basis . . . that's part of the reason independents are so attracted to his candidacy and we believe we can make the case to some of those Clinton supporters.

Hazelbaker Calls Obama's Trip "The First of its Kind Campaign Rally Overseas" (FNC, 07/17/08, 10:38am)
BILL HEMMER: What do you make of this coverage? What do you think of it?

JILL HAZELBAKER: Well in every campaign, time is a finite resource so it's unproductive for us to spend our time worrying about how much the media loves Barack Obama. John McCain's in Missouri today talking directly to voters about how he's going to keep them safe and how he's going to keep people working.

HEMMER: Do you think there is a bias towards Senator Obama?

HAZELBAKER: Well, Senator Obama is visiting Iraq and Afghanistan, I found it interesting that he released his plan for the way forward in Iraq and Afghanistan prior to visiting the region or talking to any of the commanders on the ground. Lets drop the pretense that this is a fact-finding trip and let's call it what it is. The first of its kind campaign rally overseas.

BILL HEMMER: What you think of all the attention this trip is getting so far? Do you consider it fair? Do you consider it over the top?

JILL HAZELBAKER: It is not for me to decide. The American people choose their president. The media can cover its any way they want. Lie I said, it's unproductive for us to spend our day worrying about the media coverage that Barack Obama is going to get. But it certainly didn't escape our notice that the three networks are decamping for Europe to interview Barack Obama.

HEMMER: There are some who are saying that this is new guy treatment. Ronald Reagan go it, Michael Dukakis got it. George Bush I got it. Is that valid?

HAZELBAKER: Again, it's not for me to decide. What I hope that people will pay attention to is Barack Obama on the policy. He hasn't visited Iraq for nearly 900 days. So he has quite a few questions to answer on his way forward. On Afghanistan, I sure hope that one of these network anchors will ask him why if he had direct oversight into hearings on Afghanistan in the United States Senate, he neglected to hold even one hearing. I hope someone will ask him why he voted against funding for the troops in both Afghanistan and Iraq. Again, not for me to decide how the media covers, but there are certainly some important questions to be asked of him.

HEMMER: I respect your opinion n that. How about this, the Washington Post wrote about it yesterday. The Philadelphia Enquirer picked it up today. Saying that his position on Iraq is too confining. Are his feet planted in cement on this issue?

HAZELBAKER: I think he has some problems with the far left in his party. Barack Obama was opposed to the surge from the beginning. John McCain stood up when the situation was deteriorating in Iraq and said we need a new strategy. He fought hard with members of his own party for the strategy that is succeeding today. It is going to be difficult for Barack Obama to continue to say that we need to leave Iraq when we see success on the ground.

HEMMER: It appears come September more U.S. troops are going be pulled out of Iraq. If you read all the tea leaves out there it appears that is the way it is going to go. Does that take this issue, if not entirely off the table, make it less of an issue come September and October, leading up to the campaign?

HAZELBAKER: Of course not. Iraq and Afghanistan as well continue to be a significant point of national security for the United States. It is an issue of judgment. John McCain had the judgment to stand up and say we need a new strategy in Iraq, we need a surge strategy that is working. The American people are going to have to decide whether john McCain' s judgment on Iraq which has proven to be right is better than Barack Obama' judgment on Iraq which has been proven to be wrong.

HEMMER: Well, the knife can cut both ways on this too, and a gaffe on a trip like this with this much coverage will amplified to the nth degree. So there is risk in this as well. […]

Shuster Presses Pfotenhauer on Katrina Oil Spills (MSNBC 07/17/08 4:02pm)

DAVID SHUSTER: We begin with Barack Obama's high-profile trip to Afghanistan, Iraq, the Middle East and Europe. This is a trip the McCain campaign has been asking Obama to make for months. Nancy Pfotenhauer is a senior policy adviser with the McCain campaign . . . Obama's going to talk to commanders on the ground. Afterwards, if he says America needs to leave Iraq by 2010, would you be willing to acknowledge that this is simply a policy disagreement between the campaigns?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: What's interesting, David . . . before he left on his fact finding mission, he wrote an op-ed and gave a speech saying what his conclusions will be. So, it will be a little difficult, I think, to pass the last test when he comes back . . . you have Senator McCain who went to Iraq, who listened to commanders, came back, advocated the surge and predicted it would succeed. Then you have Obama who opposed the surge and still won't admit it succeeded. Senator McCain's foresight was better than Barack Obama's hindsight.

SHUSTER: Nancy, as you know, a key issue related to the Middle East is oil and energy independence . . . McCain supports increased offshore drilling . . . Barack Obama does not. Earlier this week on this program, though, you defended off shore drilling and said, quote, "We with stood Hurricanes Rita and Katrina and did not spill a drop." In fact, the U.S. Mineral Management Service said that Katrina and Rita caused 124 offshore spills for a total of more than 743,000 gallons of oil and refined products spilled. So, Nancy, you want to take back what you said?

PFOTENHAUER: Well, I actually do. I was misinformed. And my embarrassment aside, the point is still we had a remarkable performance, that you had about 16,000 barrels that were lost during two of the worst storms that have ever . . . hit our coastline in recent history, and keep in mind, David, that 1700 barrels per day naturally seeped into the ocean floor. 365 days a year you're at about 620 thousand barrels per day, pardon me, per year, that naturally seep into the ocean floor. So this is a remarkable performance of technology. And according to the Oceanic Industry Association, since 1985, we've pulled 7 billion gallons of oil out of the federal offshore area, and we have only filled about one one-thousandth of that oil. That's a 98.999% success rate. That's why other developed nations don't tie their hands the way we do.

SHUSTER: . . . as the McCain campaign is vetting potential running mates we've been doing the same thing . . . here are a few things we've found in our Mitt Romney archive. Watch.

MITT ROMNEY: He is the co-author of McCain-Feingold. Which I think took a whack at the first amendment and I do believe, as well, hurt our party significantly. I think it's made money have a greater influence in politics today, not less influence.

[Romney Primary ad plays]

NARRATOR: John McCain, an honorable man, but is he the right republican for the future? McCain opposes repeal of the death tax and voted against the Bush tax cuts. Twice. McCain pushed to let every illegal immigrant to stay here permanently. He even voted to allow illegal's to collect Social Security.

SHUSTER: Nancy, how does the McCain campaign feel about those Romney comments and that Romney ad from the primary?

PFOTENHAUER: Well, I, I, you've heard senator McCain say, personally, how much he appreciates all the work that Governor Romney's been doing for him. He's just a fantastic spokesperson, and advocate of senator McCain, so I, I-- Senator McCain speaks to how he feels about Mitt Romney and it's positive, certainly at this juncture. But you do point out an interesting thing that comes out of primary battles. I mean, we had Senator Biden's words quoted back at him, today, because he was criticizing Barack Obama saying, you know, back when Barack Obama rolled out his supposed counterterrorism strategy, Senator Biden shot off a press release saying, well, welcome to the club, you didn't show up for the hearings, you didn't vote for it. You're Johnny come lately I think is the term. It's interesting because you will see a lot of comparisons made during primaries that people later probably regret.

KEITH OLBERMANN: It is hard to know which is more astonishing, that John McCain does not outright deny he told a joke in 1986 about a woman who enjoyed being raped by a gorilla or the defense that McCain's campaign offered today for that joke and others . . . quote, "Did you hear the one about the woman who is attacked on the street by a gorilla, beaten senseless, raped repeatedly and left to die? When she finally regains consciousness and tries to speak, her doctor leans to hear her sigh contently and to feebly ask, 'Where is that marvelous ape?'" That was 1986. Here is today's non-apology from a spokesman who said, "McCain does not recall telling the joke." Not that McCain didn't, couldn't, wouldn't tell such a joke but, quote, "He's long said that he's said and done things in the past that he regrets. You just got to move on and be yourself—that's what people want. They want somebody who's authentic, and this kind of stuff is a good example of McCain being McCain." Apparently a rape joke is authentic McCain. Authentic also in his jokes about war with Iran, a war that would kill Americans and, as McCain joked on camera, Iranians.

REPORTER: We've learned that exports to Iran increased tenfold during the Bush administration. The biggest export was cigarettes . . .

OLBERMANN: McCain is often praised for self-deprecation, he now has a record of picking on those who are close to him, his own staff and those unable or less able to defend themselves, the elderly, even before he began to join their ranks and frequently, it seems, women, including not only his own wife, with an I stopped beating my wife line earlier this year, with an unrepeatable word years ago which he denies but also as we mentioned, rape victims and even an 18-year old, Chelsea Clinton, McCain's target of choice for a 1998 Republican audience for how ugly she was, a joke that also attacked another woman, Janet Reno, a joke for which McCain later had the decency, if not the authenticity to apologize . . . McCain's spokesman writing this off as authenticity, but if you're telling hurtful jokes about victims, isn't authentic the last thing you want to be? Who defends a rape joke, saying, in effect, lighten up, I did mean it?

RACHAEL MADDOW: You know, I interviewed Ben Smith from Politico.com about this today. I called him specifically to ask about that because I almost couldn't believe that that would be a campaign's response to something like this. That a campaign would respond to their candidate being accused of having joked about how much women love being raped by saying, that just shows how authentic he is. That's just McCain being McCain. And what Ben says is that they really meant the McCain being McCain explanation as a generic, general response to the sadistic and mean comments that McCain has made like this over the years but it's not specific to the rape joke. Which completely leaves the problem as it is. Essentially they're still saying this is authentic McCain, this is McCain being McCain and if you want him to be president, you should know that he likes to pick on women and mock 18-year old girls for their looks. It implies that they think that his sadistic streak is part of what we ought to like about him.

OLBERMANN: Well, that's called appealing to the base. Yesterday McCain was asked whether he would fill out the NAACP survey. He said he fills out literally every survey. It was a quote, "literally." But not the AFL-CIO survey on working family issues, not the American Association of People With Disabilities survey . . . not even the survey from Project Vote Smart, which was one of the groups; he sat on their board until he refused to answer their survey. If you throw in the rest of that record and the pastors he threw under the bus, where is he in terms of authenticity capital . . .?

MADDOW: If anybody's interested, there's a kind of fascinating presidential campaign that could use some reporting right now. But is it involves a candidate who changed his position on Bush's tax cuts, who changed his own lauded position on immigration reform, who changed his position on whether or not US troops should leave

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Iraq if the Iraqi government ever asked us to, changed his position on whether Afghanistan needs more troops, who changed his position on torture, who changed his position on which football team linemen he named when telling his torturers something to put them off the scent . . . if you're trying to catalogue John McCain's authenticity as a candidate, there is a fabulous collapse happening right now in American politics that is just waiting to be catalogued.

OLBERMANN: Let's say I'm not and I'm more interested in where he stands on women's groups and women's issues . . .

MADDOW: He's improved to the extent that sometimes the things that he is saying and people in his campaign are saying that are not true about his record sometimes those falsehoods about his record are better. For example, Carly Fiorina recently said that John McCain would support requiring insurance companies to also cover contraception if they cover Viagra . . . turns out he voted against that. John McCain suggest recently that he's all in favor of equal pay for equal work . . . he suggested that he's been in favor of that and his record reflects that. The problem is that he's voted against that every time he's had the chance to do so. So his falsehoods about his records are getting better for women all the time.

Carl Cameron Investigates the McCain Camp's Hypocritical Attacks on Obama's Trip (FNC, 07/17/08)

BRIT HUME: John McCain likes to portray himself as a politician who will tell you exactly what he thinks, like it or not. But some unwelcome candor from one of McCain's aids today about Barack Obama's upcoming overseas trip had the candidate promising a little straight talk with his chief of communications.

CARL CAMERON: As John McCain rolled through Missouri on his campaign bus, he found himself seemingly at odds with his communications director who was at headquarters bashing Barack Obama's upcoming foreign trip.

JILL HAZELBAKER: So let's drop the pretense and call it what it is. This is an overseas campaign rally for Barack Obama. This is not designed to inform his worldview, it's to further his political ambitions.

CAMERON: That was to be a big part of McCain's message, before and during Obama's trip. But on the straight talk express the candidate disagreed and said he'd straighten it out.

MCCAIN: I will talk to her, but the fact is I'm glad that he's going to Iraq and I'm glad that he's going to Afghanistan, and it's long, long overdue if you want to lead this nation and secure our national security.

REPORTER: So you disagree, you don't think it's a campaign trip?

MCCAIN: No.

CAMERON: McCain later clarified saying he does not think the Iraq and Afghanistan legs of Obama's trip will be campaign rallies, but Obama's European stops will be. Team Obama fired back. Quote, "The McCain campaign should stop worrying about Barack Obama's travel plans and start focusing on addressing the pressing challenges that the Bush-McCain foreign policy has made worse." At a Kansas City town hall meeting, McCain blasted Obama's opposition to the troop surge and 16 month withdrawal timetable, as based not on facts but campaign considerations.

MCCAIN: Our strategy must be dictated by the situation on the ground, not some artificially politically inspired schedule for withdrawal as Senator Obama wants to do.

CAMERON: To contrast, his own political calculus supporting the surge, McCain hauled out a line that he often used when his campaign was at its lowest point last year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: Well many political pundits said that my political ambitions were at an end. And I understood that. But I also want to remind you that I said at the time that I would much rather lose a political campaign than lose a war. And I was willing to do whatever is necessary.

CAMERON: McCain aids say that Obama's chosen an opposite course, withdrawal despite the surge's success. McCain they say knows Obama's visits to Afghanistan and Iraq will not include rallies but since he's already pre-determined his policies, it will be jammed with political theater, they say. And once Obama's out of the war zone, McCain and his aids are in total agreement, a string of Obama campaign rallies in other countries.

Dana Bash Investigates McCain's Claim That "I know how to win wars." (CNN, 07/15/08, 8:06pm)

DANA BASH: John McCain was supposed to talk, once again today about the economy. But aids scrabbled to move up a speech about Afghanistan in order to offer a contrast to Obama's address today. They saw it as a chance to play on what McCain aids believe is their turf, foreign policy.

Experience is his calling card, and on a day both candidates talked national security, John McCain laid this down as a basic test.

JOHN MCCAIN: I know how to win wars.

BASH: He offered proof. A new proposal for Afghanistan, where violence has spiked.

MCCAIN: And I'll turn around the war in Afghanistan just as we have turned around the war in Iraq. With a comprehensive strategy for victory.

BASH: McCain was an earlier supporter of the military surge in Iraq, which he repeatedly tells voters is working. He said he would apply those lessons to Afghanistan. More troops and a better strategy for how to use them.

[McCain Clip Shown]

BASH: But this was as much about slamming Obama's war plans as praising his own. Obama wants to take troops out of Iraq and send them to Afghanistan.

MCCAIN: Senator Obama will tell you that we can't win in Afghanistan without losing in Iraq. In fact, he has it exactly backwards. It is precisely the success of the surge in Iraq that shows us the way to succeed in Afghanistan

BASH: He mocked Obama for outlying his plan for Afghanistan before ever visiting the country.

BASH: Later on his bus, McCain continued to hit Obama on his national security credentials. McCain reminded reporters that Obama is chairman of the Senate Committee that oversees NATO which has command in Afghanistan, but Obama has never held a hearing.

Paul Begala Talks National Security, Calls Out Carly Fiorina for Working With Ahmadinejad, Iran (CNN, 07/15/08, 4:44pm)

WOLF BLITZER: This is the one area, as you know Paul, national security, where John McCain polls really well against Barack Obama. And some suggest whenever Obama has to deal with this, he sort of falling into a trap laid by the McCain campaign. What do you think?

PAUL BEGALA: I think tactically McCain wins the day, because he's stronger on national security in the eyes of the voters. But I think what Obama's trying to do is be strategic. He can't allow that gap to continue. That strength gap, that national security gap. So he, I think, is willing to sacrifice the day. The news of the day should

KEVIN MADDEN: […] This is exactly the type of terrain, the issue terrain, that John McCain wants. Where he wins here, is that John McCain has a certain degree of clarity here. And what Barack Obama is doing is re-litigating his position on Iraq. He's changed it in the last couple of days. He's using rather amorphous language. He's trying to win on nuance. Where as John McCain can go and make a very black and white issue, and that's where John McCain wins. He looks more like a commander in chief, and the judgment of voters right now in a lot of these polls we're seeing, is that John McCain wins that debate.

BLITZER: And the McCain campaign is really ridiculing this passage. This excerpt from Senator Obama's speech today dealing with Iranian President Ahmadinejad. […] The McCain campaign is saying, why would you meet with this guy who calls for Israel's destruction, says it's nothing more than a stinking corpse?

BEGALA: Right, that is the extension of the Bush policy. We only meet with our friends. Well, guess what? We don't have any more friends, to speak of, around the world. I think, Barack Obama has the better of the argument here. But here's the thing we should look for. When will he counter attack? If John McCain is so all-fire opposed to the Iranians, why is his chief economic advisor, Carly Fiorina, a woman who when she ran HewlettPackard as CEO, HewlettPackard was selling computers to the Iranian regime! A terrorist regime. Counter-attack Barack! If I was advising him I would say, make Carly Fiorina the Ahmadinejad. She's already participated in a company that was selling equipment to the Iranians. Computers, at that!

MADDEN: […] This, again, is where John McCain can win. It becomes a question of whether or not you have the experience, whether or not you have the readiness to take over the oval office and to be commander in chief. And Barack Obama is going to continue to lose that.

BLITZER: What about the argument that Senator Obama made today. It was a major part of this speech, when he said, you know what? Talk about national security judgment. Senator McCain was wrong back in October, November 2002 in supporting this war in Iraq. The biggest strategic blunder in recent years. I was right in opposing this war in Iraq, and all of the negative consequences, the trillion dollars Senator Obama says that have occurred. The 4,000 Americans plus, who have been killed, wouldn't have happened if Senator McCain among others wouldn't had been a cheerleader for this war.

MADDEN: Well, I think that that is an effort by the Obama campaign to make what they believe is their most compelling argument. But I think a lot of Americans right now are not going to be making a judgment on this election at this time based on whether or not we ought to be re-litigating when we went in. But instead, what's your plan for going forward? How are you going to achieve success?

BLITZER: Is it just history?

MADDEN: Who has the best credentials to do that?

BLITZER: Politically, put on your strategic political hat, can he make the case as he tried to do repeatedly against Hillary Clinton, I was right in opposing this war, she was wrong in voting for it. And now he'd have to make the same case against McCain.

BEGALA: It certainly worked in the primaries against Senator Clinton and his other opponents.

BLITZER: Does it work in the general election?

BEGALA: I think yes. I think it's good to go right at the other fella's strength. Don't make it the entire campaign, but go right at that. And John McCain, not just Dick Cheney, John McCain said we will be greeted as liberators. John McCain said, at one point, the war would last a month or two. It was John McCain, who was part and parcel, of misleading us into this war, and I think that is an important thing. It also has the strategic advantage of linking again, once more, to George

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

W. Bush, the most unpopular president of modern times.

BEGALA: This is where, now, John McCain is chasing Barack. Obama comes out today, as he has said for months, and said Afghanistan, al-Qaeda, Pakistan, that' where we need to be. Well guess what, Senator McCain almost never mentions Afghanistan. And just a month ago, he said we have sufficient forces in Afghanistan. Then Obama says we need more troops in Afghanistan. It's McCain now chasing Barack, saying well I guess Barack's right, we do need more troops in Afghanistan.

MADDEN: I think John McCain has shown he does have the experience, he knows a lot more about Afghanistan and this, whole entire theater on the war on terror, than Barack Obama does. […]

BEGALA: […] I thought Obama's best line today was when he said, McCain says when violence is up the troops have to say, and when violence is down the troops have to stay. McCain wants troops there a hundred years.

BARNICLE: . . . I feel badly for John McCain there.

MIKE PAUL: Translation, "I'm not ready answer that right now" is very different than "I'm not informed enough on the issue." You're putting it in a juxtaposition with this Viagra thing. You know what? I'm also thinking of the conservatives and the right, the Christian right as well. I'm just not prepared for that question right now. And frankly that's not just a John McCain problem, that's a John McCain team problem. They should've been more prepared than that. If I were working on his campaign he should've been able to answer that question.

BARNICLE: Steve, it gets into the whole pro-life, pro-choice issue and the women's vote in this country, which does not break well for John McCain, right?

STEVE MACMAHON: That's right, and this is an issue that's important to women. Sen. McCain has voted twice against requiring health insurance companies to cover contraception for women. What's Happened To McCain's Media Darling Status? (FNC, 07/17/08, 8:40pm)
BILL O'REILLY: Terry MacAlluf, you know, big guy in a Clinton world, said, was screaming that NBC News and others were in the tank for Obama and this hurt Hillary Clinton. Now, some say, the same thing is happening in the general campaign against John McCain. Do you see it that way?

HOWARD WOLFSON: Well, I think John McCain has always been the media daring. And he and his campaign must be looking around and saying, what happened? I think that the fact that the media is more disposed towards Barack Obama is a huge advantage for him. It's not a reason why he will win, but it certainly gets him a leg up. And it's a big disadvantage for John McCain who used to be the media darling.

O'REILLY: When the three anchors announced they were going to Iraq, did you feel that was strange? […] When that announcement was made did that mean anything to you?

WOLFSON: Yeah, I thought it was an unusual decision. I think the question that they would have to ask themselves is, whether they would provide the same level of coverage for John McCain?

O'REILLY: Well the answer is no.

WOLFSON: The answer I think is unknown because McCain hasn't had a trip of this length.

O'REILLY: No, but they wouldn't do it. However, to be fair and you know I always like to be that, Barack Obama and Iraq is a huge story. So we all know where John McCain stands on Iraq, he's not going to change his mind. That's it. But now, Obama's waffling on it a little bit. So, everybody's going, well what's he going to do here? So there it becomes a bigger story.

WOLFSON: Well, it's also a ratings issue. Barack Obama is interesting to viewers […] If I'm in the McCain campaign I'm looking for equitable coverage.

O'REILLY: You're not going to get it though.

WOLFSON: So far I'd say it be a real concern if I were working for John McCain. And I think it must be, again, especially shocking for them because for so long John McCain has enjoyed such good press.

Who's Really the Media Darling This Election? (FNC, 07/17/08, 8:15pm)
BERNARD GOLDBERG: If we needed any more proof Bill, that the networks were on the Barack Obama campaign team, this is it. They're covering this upcoming trip as if he were already the president. By sending their anchors they're also sending a not so subtle message to their audience. Their message is this trip is important, because we don't send our anchors unless the trip is important, right? And they're also saying it's a lot more important than the trip to the Middle East that campaign made. Because John McCain, as far as a lot of the mainstream media is concerned, is just another run of the mill white politician and Barack Obama is anything but that. According to the mainstream media.

JANE HALL: You know, let me take a bit of the other side. When John McCain was running his candidacy in 2000 for presidency, he said the press was his base. The guy was running on fumes and wall to wall media coverage. Obama benefits from being the new kid on the block. I agree with you that this gives the importance of a state visit, which is a little premature. […]

BILL O'REILLY: […] Is this fair?

HALL: I think it's a bit much, but, republicans have made his lack of foreign policy experience an issue. And the

Stephen Colbert Devotes Word to McCain and Psychology of Economy (Comedy Central, 07/16/08, 11:40pm)

STEPHEN COLBERT: Nation, oil's at nearly $140 dollars a barrel. It's getting so that to fill your gas tank you have to take out a mortgage from your bank. If you can still find a bank that's in business. Only two years ago oil was at $78 dollars a barrel. If gas gets any higher, it'll be starring in a movie opposite Tommy Chong. There's a lot of debate over what's causing this crisis, but luckily some leaders understand what the real problem is.

JOHN MCCAIN: I think psychologically. And a lot of our problems today, as you know, are psychological. Confidence, trust, uncertainty about our economic future, ability to keep our own home.

COLBERT: Losing your home is psychological. A lot of people forget that shelter is really just a state of mind. Clearly America needs psychological help. Which brings us to tonight's word. Placebo.

Folks, when scientists have a new medicine, they test it on two groups. One that gets the life saving drug, and one that is told they are getting the life saving drug, but in fact are getting a sugar pill called a placebo.

[Also Called "Airborne"]

Well, sometimes, sometimes a funny thing happens. Patients who have taken the sugar pill get better.

[Until They Contract Diabetes]

You see, what happens is their brain fools their body into believing that useless pill was medicine.

[Same Part of Brain That Generates Votes for Ron Paul]

Well, I think what we need right now is a national sugar pill.

[Technically, High-Fructose Corn Syrup]

John McCain and President Bush understand that. Here's what the President had to say about their plans to expand offshore drilling.

BUSH: I readily concede that it's not going to produce a drop of oil tomorrow, but it is going to change the psychology.

COLBERT: The psychology! You see Bush readily concedes that it's not going to help out here. But in here.

[Only Place Where He Has 50% Approval Rating]

This I believe, is a bold new direction for America.

[Straight To Fantasyland]

That folks, that's not change you can believe in. It's change you have to believe in.

[Clap Or The Gas Fairy Will Die]

My only problem with these guys is that they're telling us that their plans won't actually do anything. That's like a pot dealer standing on the street corner and saying who wants to buy some of my oregano?

[Matthew McConaughey?}

Mr. President, Senator McCain, just tell us your energy plan is the stickiest-icky. The hairiest, most chronic bud this side of the Himalaya's.

[Stephen Has No Idea What He's Talking About]

If you just do that for us I promise we'll believe you.

[See: Iraq War]

And we'll believe you because we want to. We want to believe that the nothing you're offering is the something we've all been waiting for.

[Rush For The First Time In 30 Years!]

Besides, who doesn't like sugar pills? They're cheap, they taste good, and there are no unpleasant side effects like having to change our driving habits.

[Just Our Life Expectancy]

But if you give us nothing, and tell us it's nothing, well that's a better pill to swallow.

[Placebo]

And that's the word.

Bush Continues To Push That the Economy Is Doing Well (CNN, 07/15/08, 10:23am)

GEORGE BUSH: Our citizens are rightly concerned about the difficulties in the housing markets and high gasoline prices and the failure of the democratic congress to address these and other pressing issues. Yet, despite the challenges we face, our economy has demonstrated remarkable resilience. While the unemployment rate has risen, it remains at 5.5 percent, which is still low by historical standards. And the economy continued to grow in the first quarter of this year. The growth is slower than we would have liked, but it was growth nonetheless. We saw the signs of a slowdown early and enacted a bipartisan economic stimulus package. We have now delivered more than $91 billion in tax relief to more than more than 112 million American households this year. It's going to take some time before we feel the full benefit of the economic stimulus package, but the early signs are encouraging. Retail sales were up in May and June, and should contribute and will contribute to economic growth. In the months ahead, we expect more Americans to take advantage of these stimulus payments, and inject new energy into our economy. The bottom line is this, we are going through a tough time. But our economy is continually growing, consumers are spending, businesses are investing, exports continue increasing, and American productivity remains strong. We can have confidence in the long-term foundation of our economy and I believe we will come through this challenge stronger than ever before.

Bush Talks Government Bailouts, Gas Prices, Oil Exploration, Obama's Trip to Iraq (CNN, 07/15/08, 10:33am)

REPORTER: […] Are there other entities that are so crucial to stability, that they would require government action to show support for them?

GEORGE BUSH: Government action, if you are talking about bailing out, if your question is should the government bailout private enterprise, the answer is no it shouldn't. And by the way, the decisions on Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, I hear some people say it is a bailout, I don't think it is a bailout. The shareholders still own the company. That's why I said we want this to continue to be a shareholder-owned company. In this case, there is a feeling that the government will stand behind mortgages through these new entities. And therefore we felt a special need to step up and say that we are going to provide, if needed, temporary assistance through either debt or capital. In terms of private enterprises, I do not think the government ought to be involved with bailing out companies. I think the government should create conditions so that companies can survive. I have listed four. One of the things I am deeply troubled about is the people that think it is okay to raise taxes during these times. It would be a huge mistake to raise taxes right now.

REPORTER: Mr. President, in February you were asked about Americans facing the prospect of $4 per gallon gasoline, and you said you'd had not heard of that at the time.

GEORGE BUSH: I have heard of it now.

REPORTER: Gas prices are now approaching $5 per gallon, in some parts of the country. Offshore oil exploration is obviously a long-term approach, what is the short-term advice for Americans? What can you do now to help out?

GEORGE BUSH: First of all, there is this psychology in the oil market that basically says that supplies are going to stay stagnant while demand rises. And that is reflected somewhat in the price of crude oil. Gasoline prices are reflected. The amount of gasoline, the price at the pump is reflected in the price of crude oil. And therefore, seems like it makes sense to me to say to the world, that we going to use new technologies to explore for oil and gas in the United States. Offshore oil, Anwar, oil shail projects, to help change the psychology, to send a clear message that the supplies of oil will increase. Secondly, obviously, good conservation measures matters. I have been reading a lot about how the automobile companies are beginning to adjust. Consumers are beginning to say, now wait a minute, I don't want a gas guzzler anymore, I want a smaller car. So, the two need to go hand in hand. There is no immediate fix. This took us a while to get to this problem, there is no short-term solution. I think I was in the rose garden where I issued this brilliant statement, if I had a magic wand, but the president doesn't have a magic want. You just can't say, low gas. It took us awhile to get here, and we need to have a good strategy to get out of it.

REPORTER: What about the strategic petroleum oil reserve, what about opening up that?

BUSH: The strategic petroleum oil reserve is for emergencies, but that doesn't address the fundamental issue. And we need to address the fundamental issue, which i frankly, have been talking about since I first became president, which is a combination of using technology to have alternative sources of energy but, at the same time, finding oil and gas here at home. Now is the time to get it done. I heard somebody say, well it's going to take seven years. Well if we had done this seven years ago, we would be having a different conversation today. i am not suggesting that it would have completely, you know, changed the dynamics in the world, but it certainly would have been, we would be using more of our own oil and spending less money overseas.

REPORTER: And we know you prize loyalty, and I ask, I wonder if you feel betrayed by Scott McClellan' assessment of the war in Iraq. And moving forward, since there have been positive signs on the ground in Iraq, Senator Obama is also about to take a trip there. What would be your advice to him as he tries to assess the situation on the ground?

BUSH: I have had no comment, no comment now on Scott's book. Secondly, I would ask him to listen carefully to Ryan Crocker and General Petraues. There is a temptation to let the politics at home get in the way with the considered judgment of the commanders. That is why i strongly rejected an artificial timetable of withdrawal. It is kind of like an arbitrary thing. We will decide, in the halls of Congress how to conduct our affairs in Iraq based upon polls and politics, and we will impose this on people. As opposed to listening to our commanders, and our diplomats, and listening to the Iraqis for that matter. The Iraqi's have invited us to be there. But they share a goal with us, which is to get our troops out as conditions permit. Matter of fact, that is what we are doing. Return on success has been the strategy of this administration. And our troops are coming home, but based upon success. So I would ask that whoever goes there, whatever elected official goes there, to listen carefully to what is taking place. And understand that the best way to go forward is to listen to the parties actually on the ground. That is hard to do, I understand for some in Washington, there is a lot of pressure. You got these groups out there, moveon.org , banging away on these candidates, it is hard to kind of divorce yourself from the politics. I am glad that all, a lot of these elected officials are going over there. Cause they are going to get an interesting insight. Something that you don't get from just reading your wonderful newspapers, listening to your t.v. shows.

Bush Says We are Already "Surging" and Have "Surged" In Afghanistan (CNN, 07/15/08, 10:44am)
REPORTER: Should Americans expect a troop surge in Afghanistan?

GEORGE BUSH: We are surging troops in Afghanistan. We will analyze the situation, of course, and make a determination based on the conditions on the ground. But we did surge troops. We surged troops, France surged troops, I said in Bucharest, we'll add more troops. And then, of course, we have to make sure that the strategy works. Have a counter-insurgency strategy that not only provides security but also provides economic follow up after the security has been enhanced. The question really facing the country is will we have the patience and determination to succeed in these very difficult theaters. And I understand exhaustion. And I understand people getting tired. But I would hope that whoever follows me understands that we are at war. And now is not the time to give up in the struggle against this enemy. And that while there has not been an attack on the homeland, that is not to say that people do not want to attack us. And safe havens become very dangerous for the American people, and we need to deny that safe haven. And at the same time, win the struggle by advancing democracy. This is an ideological struggle that we are involved in. These people kill for a reason. They want us to leave, they want us to, you know, not push back, they do not want democracy to succeed. And yet, if given a chance, democracy will succeed. And so these two theaters are the big challenges of the time, and the war itself is a challenge.

Bush: "I'm not an economist... I'm an optimist... I am 62. I'm having trouble remembering a lot of things." (CNN, 07/15/08, 11:05am)
GEORGE BUSH: Whether the economy will turn around? I'm not an economist, but I do believe that we are growing, and I can remember, this press conference here, people yelling recession this, recession that, as if you're economists. I'm an optimist. I believe there are a lot of positive things for our economy. But I will tell you, it is not going the way it should, and I am sorry people are paying as high of gasoline prices as they are.

CNN Investigates McCain's "Meal Ticket" and Impact of Busch Deal on McCain's Fortune and Campaign (CNN, 07/15/08, 8:44pm)
CAMPBELL BROWN: So there could be some political fallout to this weeks big deal in the beer industry. The Belgium company InBev is buying Anheuser-Busch for $52 million bucks. Cindy McCain just happens to run one of the biggest Anheuser-Busch distributers in the country, beyond what she stands to make in the deal, red flags are already starting to go up on how a McCain presidency would affect his wife's business.

DAVID MATTINGLY: Fair to say, Cindy McCain, is not only a wife to Senator John McCain, she is also his meal ticket. Her reported 2006 income of more than 6 million dollars exceeded her husband's earnings 16 times over. That money pays for a wealthy lifestyle of high-end condos, an Arizona ranch, flying in a corporate jet, and more.

KEN VOGEL: He wouldn't be able to afford that if not for her. Politically, he is in Congress arguably because her company and her wealth funded his first Congressional campaign and has certainly been helpful in subsidizing his presidential campaign.

MATTINGLY: It's a lifestyle built on beer. Cindy McCain is on the chair of one of the biggest Anheuser-Busch distributers in the country. A company founded by her father with a value estimated at more than $100 million. In Congress, Senator McCain has been able to avoid a conflict of interest by staying out of the family business and excusing himself from beer related issues. But critics of that industry doubt that a President McCain would be able to stay so hands-off.

BRUCE LIVINGSTON: It would not be possible, the corporation of which Cindy McCain is an owner of has lobbied ten times in the last 8 years on various issues that have gone to Congress and that have gone to executive branch agencies.

MATTINGLY: As President, Senator McCain would run a mammoth beaurocracy with regulatory control over alcohol sales, distribution, and consumption. The next administration would probably have to deal with issues of beer taxes, labeling, maybe even the politically sensitive international merger just announced involving the giant Anheuser-Busch. These are all issues that could create a conflict because they could have an impact on the McCain family bottom line.

Though she does not run the day to day operations, Cindy McCain's Hensley & Co. website links to a newsletter calling for a rollback in the Federal beer tax. And this 2005 letter posted on the internet by the Los Angeles Times shows company executive Andrew McCain. Yes, that is the Senator's son lobbying against a Federal beer labeling proposal.

JAMAL SIMMONS: Of course there are red flags. The real question is not so much about what Cindy McCain does for a living, because she can do whatever she wants to do for a living, this is America. The question is whether or not John McCain is going to lead a transparent government, and he so far is not leading a transparent campaign. Here's what I mean. He hasn't talked about how much he pays, or why he doesn't pay full fair for those airplane flights he flies around in that jet. He doesn't talk about what's going to happen to Cindy McCain if he goes into the White House. And so the question is, of course he listens to somebody like Phil Gramm who thinks that the economy is all in our heads, or that economic problems are all mental, because John McCain he has eight houses, they spend $750,000 on credit cards in one month, and he's flying around the country in this corporate jet. He's not in touch with where most of Americans are.

BROWN: McCain has used his wife's fortune to help fund his campaign, providing a private plane to travel around the country. […] Does he have an obligation to be open with people about this if you want to be president of the United States?
[…]

GLORIA BORGER: There is sort of a basic issue of transparency here, because this is sort of the bedrock of John McCain's campaign, which he wants to be open. His wife has only released the first two pages of her 2006 tax returns. And I remember in covering the 2004 campaign when Teresa Heinz Kerry who is also a very wealthy women, wealthier than Cindy McCain, did not want to release her taxes, republicans were complaining about it.

[…]

SIMMONS: That month where he was spending $750,000 dollars on credit card debts was from March 2007 until the beginning of, middle of 2008, and that's when they were spending all this money on credit cards. They would not have been able to keep the John McCain campaign alive had he not had this personal wealth.

fragmentation-and-competition

The ongoing fragmentation in Iraq and Syria is the latest episode in a series of ev ents that is shaking the foundations of today's Middle East. The region has entered a fluid period of transition involving the growing power of non-state actors, including new Islamist extremist groups, at a time of increased competition for influence among the key countries in the region.

For decades, the United States has grappled with formulating a Middle East strategy that advances both its interests and its v alues. Under President Barack Obama, the top U.S. priorities in the Middle East hav e included preventing a terrorist attack on the homeland; stopping Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon; ending the Iraq War; maintaining a secure flow of energy from the region; and trying to broker Arab-Israeli peace.

The United States has struggled to define its position since the Arab uprisings in 2011, which sparked a new era of competition among the leading powers in the region. The role and status of Islamists such as the Muslim Brotherhood, which rose to power after the uprisings in some Arab countries, have been central in this intraregional struggle. Also, violent Salafi jihadists such as the Islamic State of Iraq and al-Sham, or ISIS, seek to break down national borders and establish an Islamic state by force. This report, based on field research conducted by the Center for American Progress in multiple countries during the past y ear, analyzes the current strategic environment and outlines lessons learned that should inform U.S. policy. Those lessons include:

- The 2011 Arab uprisings sparked a regional competition in a new "Middle East cold war." The leading countries of the Middle East and North Africa are engaged in an intense, multipolar, and multidimensional struggle for influence and power. This competition goes beyond Shia-Sunni sectarian divisions and inv olves traditional tools of power projection—such as military aid and economic assistance—as well as new forms of power projection, including direct investments in media outlets, non-state actors, and political movements. The region's wealthier, more politically stable states compete with each other by proxy—and in some cases, directly—on the ground in poorer and politically polarized states. This competition has taken on many features of a cold war: different sides engaged in proxy battles across the region using multiple means of influence.
    - The status of Islamist movements is central to this regional competition. The Muslim Brotherhood's empowerment and subsequent remov al from power in Egypt has been a main ev ent and central to this regional struggle. Some states such as Qatar and Turkey back the Muslim Brotherhood, while others such as Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, or UAE, oppose it. Another new dynamic is the rise of extremist Islamist groups that have challenged the Al Qaeda movement. New political openings, as well as ongoing conflicts such as the civil war in Syria, have enabled a range of political Islamist groups, including the ultraorthodox Salafists, to affect politics in countries such as Egypt and Tunisia and fostered a strand of Islamist extremist groups that has emerged in Syria and Iraq. The regional contest over the status of political Islamists has broad reach; it has contributed to disarray within the Syrian opposition, influenced relations among different Palestinian factions, and affected competition among the various armed groups in Libya.
    - The United States remains the dominant military power in the region but lacks sufficient diplomatic, political, and economic tools to influence regional political trends. The new and still unfolding regional dynamics limit the effectiveness of a U.S. policy that maintains a heav y reliance on traditional tools of power, such as the military and intelligence. The current U.S. policy approach lacks a nimble and effective ability to engage multiple centers of power in the region politically and economically in strategies that emphasize political pluralism and prosperity. The Obama administration's engagement with political Islamist organizations such as the Muslim Brotherhood created confusion in the region about U.S. policy priorities and values. The U.S. response to the Arab uprisings and the new Middle East cold war has been unev en and the United States has often appeared as little more than a bystander.

The major changes underway in regional power dynamics point to a need to make U.S. foreign policy in the Middle East and North Africa more adept at understanding and responding to political currents in a way that reflects both U.S. core security interests and values. Simply focusing on questions of how many troops are stationed in a particular country for what period of time or how much bilateral security assistance the United States gives to a particular country is too narrow and inadequate to deal with the historical changes sweeping the region and upending its political balance.

A wider range of state actors are seeking to adv ance their interests and values across the region, and the regional landscape now includes a number of non-state actors that have broader reach and impact than they did in previous eras. The United States will not be able to dictate or control events, but many in the region still examine what the United States say s and does v ery closely . Most of its key governments take active steps to shape the trajectory of U.S. policy. The United States should make the most of these diplomatic engagements to craft a wiser engagement policy that seeks to isolate and defeat extremist ideologies in the ongoing battle of ideas.

The Early Word: From Moscow to L.A.

More Energy Ads: The nail-biting House vote on the major climate change bill, now a week and a half old, continues to spark ad campaigns, a sign that the energy legislation could continue to be front-and-center in the coming months. The Americans United for Change, a labor-supported advocacy group, will go up with television spots on Tuesday backing a group of moderate, mostly freshmen Democrats who supported the climate bill. (The group went on the air last week with a more generic ad campaign.)

Their latest ads include this one , backing Representative Frank Kratovil, a freshman Democrat from Maryland.

Other liberal groups have also sponsored ads defending moderate House members who voted for the climate bill, while the National Republican Congressional Committee hit some of those same members last week with radio and television ads. (As we noted last week, the facts in the N.R.C.C. spots have been disputed by Democrats and fact checking organizations.)

Morning Fix: Americans United Up With "Thank You" Ads: As first reported late last week on the Fix, Americans United, the leading liberal outside group involved in the promotion of President Obama's agenda is up with ads in 15 House districts thanking members for their vote in support of a climate change legislation. The ads will be on the air starting today in Democratic-held districts represented by: Reps. John Boccieri (Ohio), Mary Jo Kilroy (Ohio), Steve Driehaus (Ohio), Mark Schauer (Mich.), Betsy Markey (Colo.), Baron Hill

ADS THANK DEMS VOTING FOR ENERGY BILL

The liberal-leaning group Americans United for Change says it will be airing TV ads that thank House Democrats for voting for the energy/climate bill that recently (and narrowly) passed the House of Representatives.

The advertisements, budgeted at around $150,000, will run in several congressional districts -- including Mary Jo Kilroy's (OH), Betsy Markey's (CO), Baron Hill's (IN), Ben Chandler's (KY), and Rick Boucher's (VA).

Here's one of the ads: "Last month, Congressman Chandler voted to meet President Obama's challenge to create millions of clean energy jobs -- not in India or China, but right here, in America."

POLITICS: Liberal group's ads defend backers of House climate bill (07/06/2009)

Alex Kaplun, E&Ereporter

Liberal advocacy groups will try to provide political cover for some Democrats who voted for the sweeping House climate and energy bill last month, launching campaigns to build support for the most vulnerable lawmakers.

Americans United for Change will start 30-second television spots tomorrow in the districts of a dozen or so moderate Democrats, thanking them for supporting legislation that will create "clean-energy jobs."

The group will also run an ad on national cable with a similar theme and conduct robo-calls in 74 districts.

The television spots open with images of wind turbines and solar panels and ask, "Who will build the wind turbines, the solar panels that will create new businesses, new industries?"

The ads then tout the climate bill approved by the House last month as a step toward ensuring those jobs are created in the United States. "Last month, Congressman Chandler voted to meet President Obama's challenge to create millions of clean energy jobs, not in India or China, but right here in America," says a version of the ad that will run in Rep. Ben Chandler's (D-Ky.) district.

Similar ads will run in the districts of Democratic Reps. John Boccieri, Mary Jo Kilroy and Steve Driehaus of Ohio; Mark Schauer of Michigan; Mark Schauer of Colorado; Baron Hill of Indiana; Frank Kratovil of Maryland; Dan Maffei of New York; Mike Doyle of Pennsylvania; and Tom Perriello and Rick Boucher of Virginia.

Meanwhile, another left-leaning coalition -- including groups such as America's Building Trade Unions, Blue Green Alliance and Environmental Defense Fund -- is expected to launch its own campaign in the next few days in about a dozen congressional districts thanking members for their votes.

The ads come on the heels of media attacks launched by the National Republican Congressional Committee against some of those same lawmakers. Thus far, the NRCC effort has consisted primarily of radio ads and robo-calls, but the group also launched a television spot in Perriello's district, accusing the freshman Democrat of voting in favor of legislation that will significantly increase costs to consumers (Greenwire , July 1).

Top Republicans have made it clear that they view the climate change vote as a politically potent issue that will cost a number of House Democrats their seats in 2010.

American United thanks members on energy bill

Americans United for Change is going up with cable buys for a series of positive spots, praising the patriotism of members of Congress who voted for the American Clean Energy and Security Act; the one above is running in the district of Ohio Rep. Mary Jo Kilroy.

Allied groups are expected to run similar spots; a full list of the AUC ads is after the jump.

Beginning tomorrow, Americans United for Change will air television ads thanking House members for backing the Obama energy bill. The members cast a tough vote for a variety of reasons. Some represent coal country, for example, while others hail from GOP-leaning districts. AUC's budget is $150K; the spots will run 7/7-7/10. The ad, dubbed "Uniquely American," heralds the bill as a clean energy job creation initiative.

AUC's appreciation will be expressed to these Reps.:

John Boccieri (OH-16)
Mary Jo Kilroy (OH-15)
Steve Driehaus (OH-1)
Mark Schauer (MI-7)
Betsy Markey (CO-4)
Baron Hill (IN-9)
Ben Chandler (KY-6)
Frank Kratovil (MD-1)
Dan Maffei (NY-25)
Mike Doyle (PA-14)
Tom Perriello (VA-5)
Rick Boucher (VA-9)

The Kratovil version of the ad can be viewed above. In NH, the group is running a more generic version of the spot aimed at thanking Reps. Paul Hodes (NH-2) and Carol Shea-Porter (NH-1).

Here's the version running in the district of Rep. Baron Hill (D-IN):

The ad is a localized version of a spot they premiered last week for the D.C. media market -- which is basically a testing ground for response from the media -- with the names of individual Congressmen inserted in to be praised for voting in favor of the bill.

There will also be a generic version in the Detroit media market, and on national cable for CNN and MSNBC. This list has some overlap with the NRCC's new ad campaign against the bill.

@ 1:56 pm by Jeremy P. Jacobs

Americans United for Change is launching a series of television ads across the country this week thanking members for voting for the cap and trade legislation that passed the House about two weeks ago.

The group, which is backed primarily by labor groups, will launch ads this week in 12 districts as well as in all of New Hampshire and in the Detroit media market.

The group is also airing the same ad it ran last week again . This time it will run on national cable; last week it just ran in D.C. And it is running robocalls with the same message in 74 districts.

Americans United for Change is spending $150,000 on the blitz, which will run from Tuesday through Friday.

Check out one of the ads below that will run in Rep. John Boccieri's (D-Ohio) district. It is a variation on last week's ad, emphasizing that the legislation will create a "uniquely American" solution to the energy problems facing the country.

Ads will run in the districts of Democratic Reps. Boccieri, Mary Jo Kilroy (Ohio), Steve Driehaus (Ohio), Mark Schauer (Mich.), Betsy Markey (Colo.), Baron Hill (Ind.), Ben Chandler (Ky.), Frank Kratovil (Md.), Dan Maffei (N.Y.), Mike Doyle (Pa.), Tom Perriello (Va.) and Rick Boucher (Va.).

Additionally, the general ad will run in New Hampshire and the Detroit media market.

Liberal Groups Defend Climate Change Vote

A coalition of liberal interest groups is launching ads in 17 congressional districts over the July 4 weekend that thanks members of Congress for their vote in favor of President Obama's climate change legislation, a direct counter to a series of attacks on that same vote being sponsored by national Republicans.

Environmental Defense Fund, Americans United and Vote Vets are sponsoring the commercials, which will run in the following members' districts: Reps. Betsy Markey (Colo.), Allen Boyd (Fla.), Alan Grayson (Fla.), Suzanne Kosmas (Fla.), Baron Hill (Ind), Debbie Halvorson (Ill.), Ben Chandler (Ky.), Frank Kratovil (Md.), Gary Peters (Mich.), Mark Schauer (Mich.), Paul Hodes (N.H.), Dan Maffei (N.Y.), Mary Jo Kilroy (Ohio), Zack Space (Ohio), Tom Perriello (Va.), Gabrielle Giffords (Ariz.) and Steve Kagen (Wis.).

The release of these ads is evidence that the Democratic third party groups have grown increasingly well organized since President Obama took office roughly six months ago. The ability to funnel money to these groups and organize a coordinated message is a reflection of the stepped up coordination efforts being led by a handful of longtime Washington hands including Democratic consultant Erik Smith, who is with the group Common Purpose Project.

Liberal groups are firing back after watching national Republicans take aim at lawmakers across the country for backing a landmark climate change bill.

Americans United for Change, a liberal-minded group aligned with the Obama White House, is unleashing a wave of TV ads and robocalls thanking targeted Democrats for backing the bill.

Among those getting the public thank-you note is Rep. Thomas Perriello (D-Va.), who last week was the target of a National Republican Congressional Committee TV ad urging voters to call Perriello to tell him “he was wrong to vote for the Pelosi energy tax.”

“Last month, Congressman Perriello voted to meet President Obama’s challenge to create millions of clean energy jobs — not in India or China, but right here in America,” the Americans United for Change ad says.

All told, the organization has invested $150,000 to run 14 different ads this week. Americans United for Change will also run robocalls in 74 districts.

U.S. Rep. Mark Schauer is thanked for supporting the American Clean Energy and Security Act

U.S. Rep. Mark Schauer, D-Battle Creek, is among 15 Democratic members of Congress from mostly coal producing or coal-reliant districts and states, that will be thanked in television ads beginning today, paid for by Americans United for Change.

Schauer is being thanked for his vote in support of the American Clean Energy and Security Act last month. In addition to the TV ads that will run through the end of the week, which the group has spent $150,000 on, it will also begin using robo calls in 74 congressional districts, according to a statement.

This bill has been the subject of much debate, and will continue to be as the 2010 election cycle ramps up.

"These Members helped America take a giant leap towards becoming the global standard for clean energy while creating millions of new jobs in the process. The Obama clean energy jobs bill will help build a solid foundation for long-term economic prosperity while reducing our nation's dependence on foreign oil and curbing pollution that causes global warming," Tom McMahon, Acting Executive Director, Americans United for Change said in a statement. "We want to make sure these Members' constituents know that what their Representative voted for was creating tens of thousands of new clean energy jobs in their states. Lord knows, the special interests are already out there peddling misinformation and muddying the water over what this bill is all about : clean energy jobs."

The NRCC has been targeting a number of the same Democrats that the AUC is thanking this week for voting for what Republicans call the energy tax. Schauer is not among the Democrats the NRCC is targeting this time.

Since both sides are out either thanking or attacking these Democrats, it's pretty obvious that both sides think these members are vulnerable in 2010. Does the fact that the NRCC has decided not to go after Schauer this time mean it is giving up on the 7th District, especially since it has yet to produce a candidate?

Ohio Rookie Reps Get Air(wave) Cover

Americans United for Change plans to take to the airwaves this week with ads praising first-term Representatives Mary Jo Kilroy, John Boccieri, and Steve Driehaus for their votes on the American Clean Energy and Security Act.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ads like these probably won't persuade anyone to directly support the Democratic candidates, but they can help maintain support ahead of likely GOP attack ads coming down the road this fall and into next year.

Here's a look at the Kilroy ad...

Ohio Congressman John Boccieri gets slammed -- then praised -- for his vote on energy

by Stephen Koff / Washington Bureau Chief

http://www.cleveland.com/news/index.ssf/2009/07/john_boccieris_energy_vote_is.html

Thursday July 02, 2009, 5:09 PM

WASHINGTON - Last Friday's contentious energy bill vote in Congress prompted the National Republican Congressional Committee this week to target the districts of Congress members John Boccieri, Mary Jo Kilroy and Zack Space with robo-calls and negative Web ads. The message to Ohioans: These Democrats voted against your interests and would force your energy bills to spike.

Goes one automated call: "Your congressman, John Boccieri, voted this past Friday for a huge national energy tax -- a tax on natural gas and electricity that will hit every American family and small business."

It notes others' criticisms of the bill and instructs constituents to call Boccieri and "let him know that his vote on the Nancy Pelosi National Energy Tax is a vote against American families."

But now comes a group with strong Democratic and organized labor ties, Americans United for Change, with plans to run ads supporting three Ohio Democrats for their votes on the bill.

Ads in support of Boccieri, whose district includes Canton and part of Medina County, will run in the Cleveland television market next week, said Lauren Weiner, a spokesman for Americans United. Similar ads will run in the markets served by Kilroy, of Columbus, and Steve Driehaus, of suburban Cincinnati. Each market will have "five-figure" media buys, she said, and the ads will start Tuesday and run for about a week.

Americans United has run numerous campaigns like this before, promoting an issues agenda that often is indistinguishable from that of the Democratic Party. Weiner said the ads in support of the three Ohioans are an extension of a commercial that ran in Washington, D.C., this week, thanking Congress for supporting the clean-energy bill.

But if the ads are not a direct response to the NRCC's criticism of carefully selected Democratic lawmakers -- each one potentially vulnerable in the 2010 election -- they are at least in recognition of the political risks the lawmakers took.

"We appreciate their support and recognize this decision in Ohio is a sensitive one," said Weiner, adding that Americans United also believes it is one that will move the nation's economy and energy development along. The commercials say, "Through investments in scientific research and development, and the vigorous pursuit of alternative and renewable energy, we can create millions of green jobs that allow us to reduce greenhouse gases and excel in a competitive global economy."

Paul Lindsay of the NRCC sees it differently, noting that the energy bill has a tough road to passage in the Senate -- and saying that's a good thing.

"Hopefully Ohio families will never have to pay the price for the skyrocketing costs and lost jobs that this National Energy Tax would impose if it became law, but that doesn't mean their representatives in Washington shouldn't have to pay a price for supporting it," Lindsay said. "This ad offensive by phone and the Web is only the beginning of what Ohio Democrats like John Boccieri can expect for making this potentially career-ending vote."

Progressive group plans pro-Markey ads on cap and trade

by: BobMoore

Thu Jul 02, 2009 at 17:11:37 PM MDT

(- promoted by Colorado Pols)

The progressive group Americans United for Change announced today that it plans a five-figure TV ad campaign next week, praising Rep. Betsy Markey for her vote on cap and trade.

The ads will air on Fort Collins and Denver cable systems, according to spokesman Jeremy Funk. (Denver cable? Really?)

The announcement came a day after the National Republican Congressional Committee announced it was beginning a campaign critical of 14 House Democrats who supported cap and trade, including Markey. The anti-Markey initiative will consist of robo-calls and a YouTube video.

Funk said the AUC ads are not a response to the NRCC efforts. However, the NRCC is active in 14 districts on cap and trade, while AUC will be active in 13.

A version similar to the planned Markey ad can be seen here:

A day after the National Republican Congressional Committee announced it would begin a robo-call and Web ad campaign criticizing Rep. Betsy Markey for her vote on the "cap and trade" energy bill, a progressive group is riding to her defense.

Americans United for Change announced Thursday that it will begin running TV ads in Fort Collins and Denver next week supporting Markey for her vote. The ad is a tweaked version of one praising House supporters of the bill that's now airing in the D.C. market.

Here's the text of the ad that spokesman Jeremy Funk said will begin airing on cable stations next week. Funk said the group will spend "in the five-figure range" to air the ad.

Who will build the wind turbines…. the solar panels…. that will create new businesses…new industries?Clean energy represents the jobs of the future. But will they be American jobs?Last month, Congresswoman Markey voted to meet President Obama's challenge to create millions of clean energy jobs ….not in India or China, but right here, in America…It's a foundation for America's long-term economic success…making us world leader in clean energy.The challenge is global. And the solution…uniquely American.

The ad closes with a screen image urging viewers to call Markey to thank her for voting for the bill.

Bob Duffy, the chairman of the Colorado State University political science department, said the ad is "an effort to help Markey, give her some cover for the vote."

"The purpose of these competing 'campaigns' is to generate some free media coverage, and to frame the vote (for the long term) as either a tax hike (Republicans) or job creation (Democrats). This will be a battle that plays out until November 2010, as both sides seek to find issues or votes to create a 'picture' of Markey for the general election," Duffy said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CSU political scientist John Straayer called the ad "predictable, and a prelude in the run-up to the election." He also said the NRCC and Americans United for Change efforts are an attempt to frame issues for 2010.

"For Markey, it's jobs, clean environment, solving problems. For the Republicans, on the same issues, it will be rising deficits thus jeopardizing our future, energy "taxes" on hard working folk and creating problems."

Americans United for Change is organized under Section 501(c)4 of the tax code, which means it's not required to disclose its donors. It's "a progressive issue advocacy organization," Funk said.

He said the group's ad is not a response to the NRCC efforts. Americans United for Change will run similar ads in 13 congressional districts. The NRCC is targeting 14 districts in its campaign. Here's the version of the ad currently airing in D.C.:

Roanoke TV station airs revised ad against Perriello

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By RAY REED

Published: July 7, 2009

On Monday, a Roanoke-based television station started broadcasting a Republican Party group's ad that targets Rep. Tom Perriello, the station's general manager said Thursday.

Last week, WDBJ-TV did not run the original version of the ad, which was sponsored by the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Perriello, D-5th District, was the only congressman for whom the NRCC bought TV time to attack his vote in favor of the Clean Energy and Security Act, also known as the cap-and-trade bill.

Jeffrey Marks, president and general manager of WDBJ Television Inc., said the NRCC revised the ad after the station relayed to it some concerns Perriello's office had raised.

"They revised the ad, it dealt with those issues and it's on the air," Marks said Monday.

"There were issues the Perriello camp raised that we thought were legitimate about the source of the information and what it referred to.

"We passed those on to the Republican group that was sponsoring the ad. They revised the ad, and it seemed to address those issues," Marks said.

Perriello said the original version of the ad was inaccurate because it cited a Washington Times editorial about the bill's cost to consumers.

The cost analysis, one of several that emanated from Washington sources last week, was done by the Heritage Foundation, and that data was used incorrectly, Perriello said.

Marks said WDBJ didn't take sides in the dispute. The actual argument was between Perriello's office and the NRCC, he said.

"This came off as being very adversarial," Marks said. "It wasn't, as far as we were concerned. The parties may be adversaries," but the station wasn't, he said.

Also on Monday, a Democrat-leaning interest group said it would broadcast a TV ad in the Roanoke-Lynchburg market supporting Perriello's vote on the energy bill.

Americans United for Change said it was praising members of Congress in 15 districts for voting for the bill, which the group said would help establish America as a leader in clean energy and create millions of American jobs.

Americans United on TV With Energy Spots: Americans United, the most active liberal outside group in the early months of the Obama administration, is launching a five-figure television buy today in support of the president's energy plan. The ad , which is running in the Washington media market on cable stations for now, seeks to tie the energy proposal to job creation. "Clean energy represents the jobs of the future," says the ad's narrator. "But will they be American jobs?" The ad goes on to tout the Obama plan as the "foundation for America's long term economic success". A source familiar with the buy suggested that it may well be expanded to include states represented by senators who remain uncommitted to supporting the legislation.

Americans United Ad: Climate Bill Creates Jobs "Not In India Or China, But Right Here"

By Eric Kleefeld - July 1, 2009, 11:08AM

Americans United for Change has this new TV ad in the D.C. media market -- essentially aimed at the political and journalistic classes -- praising the energy bill that was passed in the House and now faces a tough fight in the Senate:

The ad gives a patriotic fervor to the bill, focusing on the development of clean-energy jobs in this country. "Last month, Congress met President Obama's challenge to create millions of clean energy jobs," the announcer says, "not in India or China, but right here, in America."

Obama allies push energy bill

Email |Link |Comments (0) Posted by Foon Rhee, deputy national political editor July 1, 2009 11:21 AM

A pro-Obama, Democratic grassroots group unveiled a new TV ad today, lauding the House for passing a landmark climate change bill and urging supporters to call their senators to do the same.

The spot, from Americans United for Change, is to air in Washington this week and asserts that the legislation will create millions of clean energy jobs. "It's a foundation for America's long-term economic success, making us world leader in clean energy," the announcer says. "The challenge is global. And the solution uniquely American."

After lots of arm-twisting by President Obama and his aides, and quite a bit of horse-trading, the House on Friday narrowly passed the bill on a 219-212 vote. It is designed to lower how much carbon is pumped into the atmosphere through a "cap-and-trade" system in which carbon emissions are capped and permits to pollute are given away or sold by the government.

But the bill faces tough sledding in the Senate, and some observers don't believe it will pass this year, though Obama wants final passage before he attends an international global warming conference in Copenhagen.

Obama and his allies are ramping up their grassroots efforts to put pressure on senators.

“Thanks to the extraordinary leadership in Congress, America has taken a giant leap towards becoming the global standard for clean energy while creating millions of new jobs in the process," Tom McMahon, acting executive director of Americans United for Change, said in a statement. "This historic legislation will help build a solid foundation for long-term economic prosperity by meeting President Obama’s challenge to reduce our nation’s dependence on foreign oil and curbing pollution that causes global warming. This ad is designed to encourage Congress to continue standing up to the forces of ‘status quo’ and move this historic clean energy jobs bill to the President’s desk as quickly as possible.”

Americans United for Change are going up with a new ad this week backing the clean energy bill that passed the House last week..

Much like President Obama has in his remarks about the legislation, the ad focuses on the jobs aspect of the cap and trade bill, which passed last Friday by a narrow 219 to 212 vote.

"Last month, Congress met President Obama's challenge to create millions of clean energy jobs, not in India or China, but right here, in America," the narrator says. "It's a foundation for America's long-term economic success, making us world leader in clean energy."

The ad is going up on D.C. cable, so it is a small ad buy focused on D.C. lawmakers and opinion makers.

Rubio and Clinton to Have an Island All to Themselves

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senator Marco Rubio of Florida spoke at the Prescott Bush Awards Dinner in Stamford, Conn., in June. Eric Thay er for The New York Times

By Jeremy W. Peters

Good Friday morning. Donald J. Trump had a big day on Thursday , but on Friday, other candidates, Senator Marco Rubio of Florida and Hillary Rodham Clinton*, will find themselves in Puerto Rico at the same time. And Mr. Rubio is wasting little time previewing his idea of what the general election might look like.*

"Marco vs. Hillary in Puerto Rico this Friday," reads the news release from the Rubio campaign, like a flyer promoting an event more suited to a boxing ring than a presidential race.

And while Mrs. Clinton has acted like she would rather just ignore the Florida senator — her campaign sent out a statement of its own saying only that she would be visiting a cardiovascular care center on the island primarily to discuss health care issues — Mr. Rubio sees their visits on Friday as an opportunity to draw clear contrasts with the candidate that many expect to be the Democratic nominee.

Their trips were not planned to coincide, but Mr. Rubio, seems eager to make the most of it. Mrs. Clinton does not speak Spanish. He does, and he plans to make good use of it while he's there.

He also wrote an op-ed (in English and Spanish) that was published on Friday in El Nuevo Día, Puerto Rico's largest newspaper by readership. In it, Mr. Rubio outlined how, unlike Mrs. Clinton and Jeb Bush, another Floridian who is one of Mr. Rubio's chief rivals, he does not support allowing the island's municipalities to reorganize their debt in bankruptcy. (Stateside municipalities can do so under bankruptcy law, but as a commonwealth, Puerto Rico's cannot.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"So far, Hillary Clinton's liberal hosts in San Juan today have failed to propose any serious measures to fix Puerto Rico's economic challenges," he wrote in the piece.

Of course, there is a subtext to Mr. Rubio's jabs. He hopes their dueling appearances are just a preview of what's to come in the general election.

What We're Watching Today

- King Salman of Saudi Arabia will visit President Obama at the White House, but the kingdom's oil production will barely get a mention. Instead, the first order of business for the Saudi king is likely to be the Iran nuclear deal, analysts said.

- Jake Sullivan, a key staff member for Mrs. Clinton when she was secretary of state, will be interviewed privately by the House committee investigating the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya. Another aide, Cheryl D. Mills, testified on Thursday.

The hottest ticket in town this month may be inside the House chamber, but second to that will be passes to the lawn of the West Front of the Capitol, where 50,000 people are expected to gather to watch a broadcast of Pope Francis' address to a joint meeting of Congress.

After his speech, plans call for the pope to walk out to the speaker's balcony to appear before the public gathered on the lawn, which has been the site of holiday concerts and other events. Each member of the House will receive a ticket for the

While the broadcast may seem almost impromptu, the Capitol police have been developing the master plan for the event, including security, for months, along with Speaker John A. Boehner, who has been trying to get a papal visit to Congress for the better part of two decades.

- Kim Davis, the Kentucky county clerk who was ordered to jail for refusing to issue marriage licenses to same-sex couples, received mixed support from Republican candidates.

Bulletins: A Trump Thursday

- After much hand-wringing by his Republican rivals, Mr. Trump signed a party pledge, along with all the other candidates, to forgo a third-party run and support the eventual nominee.

- Corey Lewandowski, once a lobbyist, a political operative and a congressional aide who was arrested after he brought a gun to work, is running Mr. Trump's campaign.

- And Mr. Trump revealed gaps in his mastery of international affairs during a radio interview on Thursday, appearing to mistake the Quds Force, an Iranian military group, for the Kurds, a Middle Eastern people, and growing testy over questions about foreign leaders.

What We're Reading Elsewhere

- Mr. Carson is this season's "stealth candidate," MSNBC writes , in part, because of his "contrasting humility and soft-spoken demeanor – paired with his outsider credibility and far-right views."

- Rick Santorum is the first in the crowded presidential field to campaign in each of Iowa's 99 counties, according to CBS News .

A Range of Emojis for Bernie Sanders

Berniemoji is an app that allows users to text, tweet and share emojis based on caricatures of Mr. Sanders. Scott Nash/NASHBOX Graphic Design and Illustration

As the hundreds of top-flight developers and programmers have volunteered their efforts to Mr. Sanders, some of his supporters have offered up their own quirkiness and services.

The latest: the Berniemoji , an app that allows users to text, tweet and share emojis based on caricatures of the senator.

"It started as a dare," said Scott Nash, a 55-year-old graphic designer from Portland, Me. "One of my colleagues laid down the gauntlet and said 'What's the equivalent of the Shepard Fairey portrait for Bernie?'"

Mr. Nash was referring to the portrait of Mr. Obama in 2008, his stoic gaze sitting above an all-caps "Hope" message. But every time Mr. Nash sat down to create an iconic portrait of Mr. Sanders, he struggled to find a gaze or a look that captured his momentum.

“And then it occurred to me that the key to Bernie, is he’s not iconic, he’s emotive,” Mr. Nash said. So he set about making not one portrait, but 12, all cartoonishly emotional (which was fairly unsurprising, given Mr. Nash’s background: He designed the logo for Nickelodeon way back when).

Two programmers who work with Mr. Nash, Akimitsu Hogge and Wade Brainerd, helped him amplify his illustrations.

So though Mr. Nash’s portraits of Mr. Sanders are dotting the texts and chats of supporters, when it comes to the original dare, Mr. Nash jokes, “if you can tell, I failed miserably.”

Digital Darkness and Silence for Sex Offenders in the Information Age

Andrew Extein, Truthout: Facing public shame and popular contempt, sex offenders released from prison are limited by computer surveillance, internet restrictions and narrowing digital freedoms. Does restricting the online access of an unpopular group portend diminished privacy for all of us?

Subject:	Iran riff

But before we get into the politics, I want to say a few words about one of the most important decisions we face today.

Across our country, Americans are considering and debating the nuclear agreement with Iran. Soon, it will come up for a vote in Congress. There are people of good faith on both sides of this issue, people who are committed to protecting our security and the security of our allies, especially Israel.

President Obama and Secretary Kerry have worked hard to achieve this agreement and they are making passionate arguments for why it will keep us safe and close off avenues for Iran to get a bomb. Others, like my friend Senator Schumer, are deeply skeptical. I respect their concerns. I have no illusions about Iran's true intentions or its continuing threat to Israel, the region, and the United States. That threat is real and it must be confronted.

But leadership is about hard choices. And to me, this one is clear. This agreement is the most effective path to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon. There is no viable alternative. None. I support President Obama and I encourage everyone in Congress to do the same.

As Secretary of State, I logged tens of thousands of miles and twisted a lot of arms to build a global coalition to impose the most crippling sanctions in history. That unprecedented pressure delivered a blow to Iran's economy and gave us leverage at the negotiating table, starting in Oman in 2012. We need to bring the same determination and unity to the job of enforcing this agreement and deterring Iranian aggression across the board. When this debate is over, we need to come together to ensure the President has the tools, resources, and support to send a clear message to Iran: Cheat, and you will pay. When you threaten Israel, you threaten America. And make no mistake, we will never allow you to acquire a nuclear weapon; not just during the term of this agreement -- never.

Criminal Justice Expert Expected to Lead Soros Foundations

By STEPHANIE STROM

On Wednesday , George Soros , the billionaire investor, is expected to name Christopher Stone, a well-known expert on criminal justice, the new leader of his unconv entional philanthropic empire.

Mr. Stone, a professor at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government, will fully take the helm in July of the Open Society Foundations, a sprawling constellation of more than 30 organizations that operate in places as diverse as Baltimore, Jakarta, the Kremlin and Congress.

He will succeed Ary eh Neier, who is retiring at 74 after serv ing as the Open Society's president since 1993.

"We have a very complex organization," Mr. Soros said in a telephone interview. "It has become too complicated, and it needs to be streamlined, to become more unified."

Mr. Soros has never endowed his collection of foundations, but he often gives away enough money in a year to make Open Society the most generous philanthropy in the country after the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation. This y ear, for example, it is on track to give away about $860 million.

Mr. Soros said the foundation had worked well because he and Mr. Neier "know all its nooks and crannies, but to hand it over to someone else would be very difficult."

Mr. Stone, howev er, is what Mr. Soros describes as an "outsider insider." He has worked as a recipient of Open Society grants, as an adv iser to Open Society and as a board member of one of the member groups.

Mr. Soros also noted that Mr. Stone served as the faculty director at the Hauser Center on Nonprofit Organizations at Harv ard.

“They study foundations at the center, and so he also will bring a professional understanding of such organizations to the task,” Mr. Soros said.

Mr. Stone has a track record for building organizations and systems. Early in his career, for instance, he helped found the Neighborhood Defender Service of Harlem, a nonprofit organization nationally renowned for combining a wide range of social services with traditional legal services.

“He has a passion for changing things and great vision and an understanding of how to build institutions and reimagine them so they endure,” said Barry C. Scheck, co-director of the Innocence Project.

Mr. Stone built National Defender while at the Vera Institute for Justice, a nonprofit group that works to improve justice systems, where he eventually rose to become chief executive for 10 years. He expanded Vera’s international programs, working with national governments in South Africa, Russia and Chile and developing a reputation as an expert on the professionalization of police forces.

“Police chiefs will confide in him, and at the same time, he can convene meetings of people from the grass-roots civil-rights community and command the same kind of respect,” said Thomas E. Perez, assistant attorney general for civil rights in the Justice Department and an old friend.

That ability to knit together disparate groups will come in handy at Open Society, where Mr. Soros may elect to support struggling scientists in Russia, as he did after the Soviet Union collapsed, using money he made shorting the British pound. Or he may choose to provide loan guarantees to spur the development of low-income housing in South Africa and money to endow the Central European University, which he founded.

“There’s a spirit of innovation and reform there, which is the essential starting point,” Mr. Stone said. “What I bring to that is a lot of experience with what it takes to make things really stick, to be persistent until the best ideas find their time.”

Rough Transcript:

CHRIS MATTHEWS: of course, that was florida congresswoman debby wasserman schultz in 2008. not long ago. now hillary clinton is running again and debby is the chair of the democratic committee. a long primary campaign will only erode the benefit democrats are poised to reap from the republicans' free for all. i'm convince that had a prolonged debate will do us more harm than good. is he right? are we better off with bernie noise against hillary or better off without him?

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: i think eventually the nominee of both parties benefits from having the muscle that they need exercised throughout a primary. i think it atrophies if you don't get to discuss it. i think it is healthy to have a debate throughout the contest. i don't think we'll have a terribly long one.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: hillary clinton will probably win in iowa. new hampshire will be very close. there could be an upset. won't that hurt to the left? further left than she would want to go? won't that weaken her in the general?

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: what will happen throughout the primary and the republican party. the contrast will be extremely clear. that any of our candidates, hillary clinton, hillary clinton, bernie sanders, lincoln chafee, any of them, will focus on moving our country forward. continuing job growth that we've had under president obama for more than five straight years. we were at 750 jobs a year.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: so he can beat jeb bush? linoln chafee? come on.

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: the american people are with democrats.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: do you want to see bernie sanders speak at the democratic convention? do you want him up there?

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: bernie sanders –

CHRIS MATTHEWS: do you want him on the floor of the convention?

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: bernie sanders has been a good democrat. caucuses with the democrats.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: she speak in prime time? with everybody watching?

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: bernie sanders represents, we are a big time –

CHRIS MATTHEWS: so the answer is yes.

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: said yes. i can say yes again.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: in prime time.

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: i don't know what time he should speak.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: maybe when nobody is watching, you mean.

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: no. of course he should speak. he should speak in a slot where the appeal that he has across the board, the progressive, pop list message that he has that resonates deeply and widely with the american people, not just democrats, absolutely that should be featured. the difference between us and the republicans, we are really a big party.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: whatever is the difference between a democrat and a socialist? i used to think there is a big difference. what do you think it is?

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: the difference between –

CHRIS MATTHEWS: a democrat like hillary and a socialist between bernie sanders. what's the big difference between a democrat and a socialist? you're chairman of the democratic party. tell me the difference.

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: the relevant debate we'll be having what's the difference between a democrat and a republican.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: i think there's a huge difference.

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: different between a democrat and republican is that democrats fight to make sure everybody has an opportunity to succeed. and the republicans are strangled by their right wing extremists. so where, we're watching them debate. phasing out medicare. and a candidate who actually said that president obama would march israelis to the ovens. that's the kind of debate going on on their side on. our side, we're talking about the best way that we can make sure every american has a chance to reach the middle class.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: are you in or out of the deal? the nuclear deal?

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: i'm taking my time to really know that deal well. i'm going to go home and talk to my constituents.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: i'm with you on that. let me ask you a tough question. if you vote it down, it is a -- if the congress votes it down. then you basically voted a vote of no confidence against president's foreign policy. the weird things is those on the right would say now we'll cut a better deal. how can they trust obama cut a better deal if they knock down the only plan?

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: the problem i see with people opposed to the deal, the republicans, i think, have been very irresponsible. where they're unilaterally immediately –

CHRIS MATTHEWS: they're not looking at it.

DEBBIE WASSERMAN SCHULTZ: i have the. the number one decision, what is the most likely scenario that prevents iran from getting a nuclear women -- nuclear weapon. to make sure we can draw contrast and reemphasize support to make sure everyone has access to health care throughout the entirety of their lives. before medicare, seniors faced medical bankruptcy, families were medically bankrupt. republicans like jeb bush would phase out medicare. every republican on the other side why.

CHRIS MATTHEWS: that's a solid argument. thank you. debby wasserman schultz.

Dear Friends and Colleagues,

Today President Obama is unveiling the final version of the Clean Power Plan – the strongest action ever taken in the United States to combat climate change. President Obama believes we have a moral obligation to act by not leaving future generations a planet that is damaged. While aiming to slash carbon emissions by a third by 2030, this plan will also keep energy affordable and reliable, and support innovation which will lead to a strong clean-energy economy.

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
August 3, 2015

FACT SHEET: PRESIDENT OBAMA TO ANNOUNCE HISTORIC CARBON POLLUTION STANDARDS FOR POWER PLANTS

The Clean Power Plan is a Landmark Action to Protect Public Health, Reduce Energy Bills for Households and Businesses, Create American Jobs, and Bring Clean Power to Communities across the Country

Today at the White House, President Obama and Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) Administrator Gina McCarthy will release the final Clean Power Plan, a historic step in the Obama Administration's fight against climate change.

We have a moral obligation to leave our children a planet that's not polluted or damaged. The effects of climate change are already being felt across the nation. In the past three decades, the percentage of Americans with asthma has more than doubled, and climate change is putting those Americans at greater risk of landing in the hospital. Extreme weather events – from more severe droughts and wildfires in the West to record heat waves – and sea level rise are hitting communities across the country. In fact, 14 of the 15 warmest years on record have all occurred in the first 15 years of this century and last year was the warmest year ever. The most vulnerable among us – including children, older adults, people with heart or lung disease, and people living in poverty – are most at risk from the impacts of climate change. Taking action now is critical.

The Clean Power Plan establishes the first-ever national standards to limit carbon pollution from power plants. We already set limits that protect public health by reducing soot and other toxic emissions, but until now, existing power plants, the largest source of carbon emissions in the United States, could release as much carbon pollution as they wanted.

The final Clean Power Plan sets flexible and achievable standards to reduce carbon dioxide emissions by 32 percent from 2005 levels by 2030, 9 percent more ambitious than the proposal. By setting carbon pollution reduction goals for power plants and enabling states to develop tailored implementation plans to meet those goals, the Clean Power Plan is a strong, flexible framework that will:

Provide significant public health benefits – The Clean Power Plan, and other policies put in place to drive a cleaner energy sector, will reduce premature deaths from power plant emissions by nearly 90 percent in 2030 compared to 2005 and decrease the pollutants that contribute to the soot and smog and can lead to more asthma attacks in kids by more than 70 percent. The Clean Power Plan will also avoid up to 3,600 premature deaths, lead to 90,000 fewer asthma attacks in children, and prevent 300,000 missed work and school days.

Create tens of thousands of jobs while ensuring grid reliability;

Drive more aggressive investment in clean energy technologies than the proposed rule, resulting in 30 percent more renewable energy generation in 2030 and continuing to lower the costs of renewable energy.

Save the average American family nearly $85 on their annual energy bill in 2030, reducing enough energy to power 30 million homes, and save consumers a total of $155 billion from 2020-2030;

Give a head start to wind and solar deployment and prioritize the deployment of energy efficiency improvements in low-income communities that need it most early in the program through a Clean Energy Incentive Program; and

Continue American leadership on climate change by keeping us on track to meet the economy-wide emissions targets we have set, including the goal of reducing emissions to 17 percent below 2005 levels by 2020 and to 26-28 percent below 2005 levels by 2025.

KEY FEATURES OF THE CLEAN POWER PLAN

The final Clean Power Plan takes into account the unprecedented input EPA received through extensive outreach, including the 4 million comments that were submitted to the agency during the public comment period. The result is a fair, flexible program that will strengthen the fast-growing trend toward cleaner and lower-polluting American energy. The Clean Power Plan significantly reduces carbon pollution from the electric power sector while advancing clean energy innovation, development, and deployment. It ensures the U.S. will stay on a path of long-term clean energy investments that will maintain the reliability of our electric grid, promote affordable and clean energy for all Americans, and continue United States leadership on climate action. The Clean Power Plan:

- Provides Flexibility to States to Choose How to Meet Carbon Standards: EPA's Clean Power Plan establishes carbon pollution standards for power plants, called carbon dioxide (CO_2) emission performance rates. States develop and implement tailored plans to ensure that the power plants in their state meet these standards– either individually, together, or in combination with other measures like improvements in renewable energy and energy efficiency. The final rule provides more flexibility in how state plans can be designed and implemented, including: streamlined opportunities for states to include proven strategies like trading and demand-side energy efficiency in their plans, and allows states to develop "trading ready" plans to participate in "opt in" to an emission credit trading market with other states taking parallel approaches without the need for interstate agreements. All low-carbon electricity generation technologies, including renewables, energy efficiency, natural gas, nuclear and carbon capture and storage, can play a role in state plans.

➢ More Time for States Paired With Strong Incentives for Early Deployment of Clean Energy: State plans are due in September of 2016, but states that need more time can make an initial submission and request extensions of up to two years for final plan submission. The compliance averaging period begins in 2022 instead of 2020, and emission reductions are phased in on a gradual "glide path" to 2030. These provisions to give states and companies more time to prepare for compliance are paired with a new Clean Energy Incentive Program to drive deployment of renewable energy and low-income energy efficiency before 2022.

➢ Creates Jobs and Saves Money for Families and Businesses: The Clean Power Plan builds on the progress states, cities, and businesses and have been making for years. Since the beginning of 2010, the average cost of a solar electric system has dropped by half and wind is increasingly competitive nationwide. The Clean Power Plan will drive significant new investment in cleaner, more modern and more efficient technologies, creating tens of thousands of jobs. Under the Clean Power Plan, by 2030, renewables will account for 28 percent of our capacity, up from 22 percent in the proposed rule. Due to these improvements, the Clean Power Plan will save the average American nearly $85 on their energy bill in 2030, and save consumers a total of $155 billion through 2020-2030, reducing enough energy to power 30 million homes.

➢ Rewards States for Early Investment in Clean Energy, Focusing on Low-Income Communities: The Clean Power Plan establishes a Clean Energy Incentive Program that will drive additional early deployment of renewable energy and low-income energy efficiency. Under the program, credits for electricity generated from renewables in 2020 and 2021 will be awarded to projects that begin construction after participating states submit their final implementation plans. The program also prioritizes early investment in energy efficiency projects in low-income communities by the Federal government awarding these projects double the number of credits in 2020 and 2021. Taken together, these incentives will drive faster renewable energy deployment, further reduce technology costs, and lay the foundation for deep long-term cuts in carbon pollution. In addition, the Clean Energy Incentive Plan provides additional flexibility for states, and will increase the overall net benefits of the Clean Power Plan.

➢ Ensures Grid Reliability: The Clean Power Plan contains several important features to ensure grid reliability as we move to cleaner sources of power. In addition to giving states more time to develop implementation plans, starting compliance in 2022, and phasing in the targets over the decade, the rule requires states to address reliability in their state plans. The final rule also provides a "reliability safety valve" to address any reliability challenges that arise on a case-by-case basis. These measures are built on a framework that is inherently flexible in that it does not impose plant-specific requirements and provides states flexibility to smooth out their emission reductions over the period of the plan and across sources.

➢ Continues U.S. Leadership on Climate Change: The Clean Power Plan continues United States leadership on climate change. By driving emission reductions from power plants, the largest source of U.S. greenhouse gas emissions, the Clean Power Plan builds on prior Administration steps to reduce emissions, including historic investments to deploy clean energy technologies, standards to double the fuel economy of our cars and light trucks, and steps to reduce methane pollution. Taken together these measures put the United States on track to achieve the President's near-term target to reduce emissions in the range of 17 percent below 2005 levels by 2020, and lay a strong foundation to deliver against our long-term target to reduce emissions 26 to 28 percent below 2005 levels by 2025. The release of the Clean Power Plan continues momentum towards international climate talks in Paris in December, building on announcements to-date of post-2020 targets by countries representing 70 percent of global energy based carbon emissions.

➢ Sets State Targets in a Way That Is Fair and Is Directly Responsive to Input from States, Utilities, and Stakeholders*:* In response to input from stakeholders, the final Clean Power Plan modifies the way that state targets are set by using an approach that better reflects the way the electricity grid operates, using updated information about the cost and availability of clean generation technologies, and establishing separate emission performance rates for all coal plants and all gas plants. .

➢ Maintains Energy Efficiency as Key Compliance Tool: In addition to on-site efficiency and greater are reliance on low and zero carbon generation, the Clean Power Plan provides states with broad flexibility to design carbon reduction plans that include energy efficiency and other emission reduction strategies. EPA's analysis shows that energy efficiency is expected to play a major role in meeting the state targets as a cost-effective and widely-available carbon reduction tool, saving enough energy to power 30 million homes and putting money back in ratepayers' pockets.

➢ Requires States to Engage with Vulnerable Populations: The Clean Power Plan includes provisions that require states to meaningfully engage with low-income, minority, and tribal communities, as the states develop their plans. EPA also encourages states to engage with workers and their representatives in the utility and related sectors in developing their state plans.

➢ Includes a Proposed Federal Implementation Plan: EPA is also releasing a proposed federal plan today. This proposed plan will provide a model states can use in designing their plans, and when finalized, will be a backstop to ensure that the Clean Power Plan standards are met in every state.

Since the Clean Air Act became law more than 45 years ago with bipartisan support, the EPA has continued to protect the health of communities, in particular those vulnerable to the impacts of harmful air pollution, while the economy has continued to grow. In fact, since 1970, air pollution has decreased by nearly 70 percent while the economy has tripled in size. The Clean Power Plan builds on this progress, while providing states the flexibility and tools to transition to clean, reliable, and affordable electricity.

BUILDING ON PROGRESS

The Clean Power Plan builds on steps taken by the Administration, states, cities, and companies to move to cleaner sources of energy. Solar electricity generation has increased more than 20-fold since 2008, and electricity from wind has more than tripled. Efforts such as the following give us a strong head start in meeting the Clean Power Plan's goals:

- 50 states with demand-side energy efficiency programs
- 37 states with renewable portfolio standards or goals
- 10 states with market-based greenhouse gas reduction programs
- 25 states with energy efficiency standards or goals

Today's actions also build on a series of actions the Administration is taking through the President's Climate Action Plan to reduce the dangerous levels of carbon pollution that are contributing to climate change, including:

Standards for Light and Heavy-Duty Vehicles: Earlier this summer, the EPA and the Department of Transportation proposed the second phase of fuel efficiency and greenhouse gas standards for medium- and heavy-duty vehicles, which if finalized as proposed will reduce 1 billion tons of carbon pollution. The proposed standards build on the first phase of heavy-duty vehicle requirements and standards for light-duty vehicles issued during the President's first term that will save Americans $1.7 trillion, reduce oil consumption by 2.2 million barrels per day by 2025, and slash greenhouse gas emissions by 6 billion metric tons through the lifetime of the program.

Low Income Solar: Last month, the White House announced a new initiative to increase access to solar energy for all Americans, in particular low-and moderate income communities, and build a more inclusive workforce. The initiative will help families and businesses cut their energy bills through launching a National Community Solar Partnership to unlock access to solar for the nearly 50 percent of households and business that are renters or do not have adequate roof space to install solar systems and sets a goal to install 300 megawatts (MW) of renewable energy in federally subsidized housing by 2020. Through this initiative housing authorities, rural electric co-ops, power companies, and organizations in more than 20 states across the country committed to put in place more than 260 solar energy projects and philanthropic and impact investors, states, and cities are committed to invest $520 million to advance community solar and scale up solar and energy efficiency for low- and moderate-income households. The initiative also includes AmeriCorps funding to deploy solar and create jobs in underserved communities and a commitment from the solar industry to become the most diverse sector of the U.S. energy industry.

Economy-Wide Measures to Reduce other Greenhouse Gases: EPA and other agencies are taking actions to cut methane emissions from oil and gas systems, landfills, coal mining, and agriculture through cost-effective voluntary actions and common-sense standards. At the same time, the U.S. Department of State is working to slash global emissions of potent industrial greenhouse gases, called hydrofluorocarbons (HFCs), through an amendment to the Montreal Protocol; EPA is cutting domestic HFC emissions through its Significant New Alternatives Policy (SNAP) program; and, the private sector has stepped up with commitments to cut global HFC emissions equivalent to 700 million metric tons of carbon pollution through 2025.

Investing in Coal Communities, Workers, and Communities: In February, as part of the President's FY 2016 budget, the Administration released the POWER+ Plan to invest in workers and jobs, address important legacy costs in coal country, and drive the development of coal technology. The Plan provides dedicated new resources for economic diversification, job creation, job training, and other employment services for workers and communities impacted by layoffs at coal mines and coal-fired power plants; includes unprecedented investments in the health and retirement security of mineworkers and their families and the accelerated clean-up of hazardous coal abandoned mine lands; and provides new tax incentives to support continued technology development and deployment of carbon capture, utilization, and sequestration technologies.

Energy Efficiency Standards: DOE set a goal of reducing carbon pollution by 3 billion metric tons cumulatively by 2030 through energy conservation standards issued during this Administration. DOE has already finalized energy conservation standards for 29 categories of appliances and equipment, as well as a building code determination for commercial buildings. These measures will also cut consumers' annual electricity bills by billions of dollars.

Investing in Clean Energy: In June the White House announced more than $4 billion in private-sector commitments and executive actions to scale up investment in clean energy innovation, including launching a new Clean Energy Impact Investment Center at the U.S. Department of Energy (DOE) to make information about energy and climate programs at DOE and other government agencies accessible and more understandable to the public, including to mission-driven investors.

Libertarian leaders say it's a mistake to conflate the fortunes of Sen. Rand Paul's presidential candidacy with the success of the movement as a whole. (AP Photo/Jim Cole)

BY JAMES HOHMANN

THE BIG IDEA by David Weigel: The Libertarian Moment is over, or is it? One year ago, in a flag-planting cover story for the New York Times magazine, Robert Draper asked whether a "libertarian moment" had come at last. The memorable art for the story was a fuzzed-out image of Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), patterned after a hardcore show flyer, with a date of 11/8/16. Election Day.

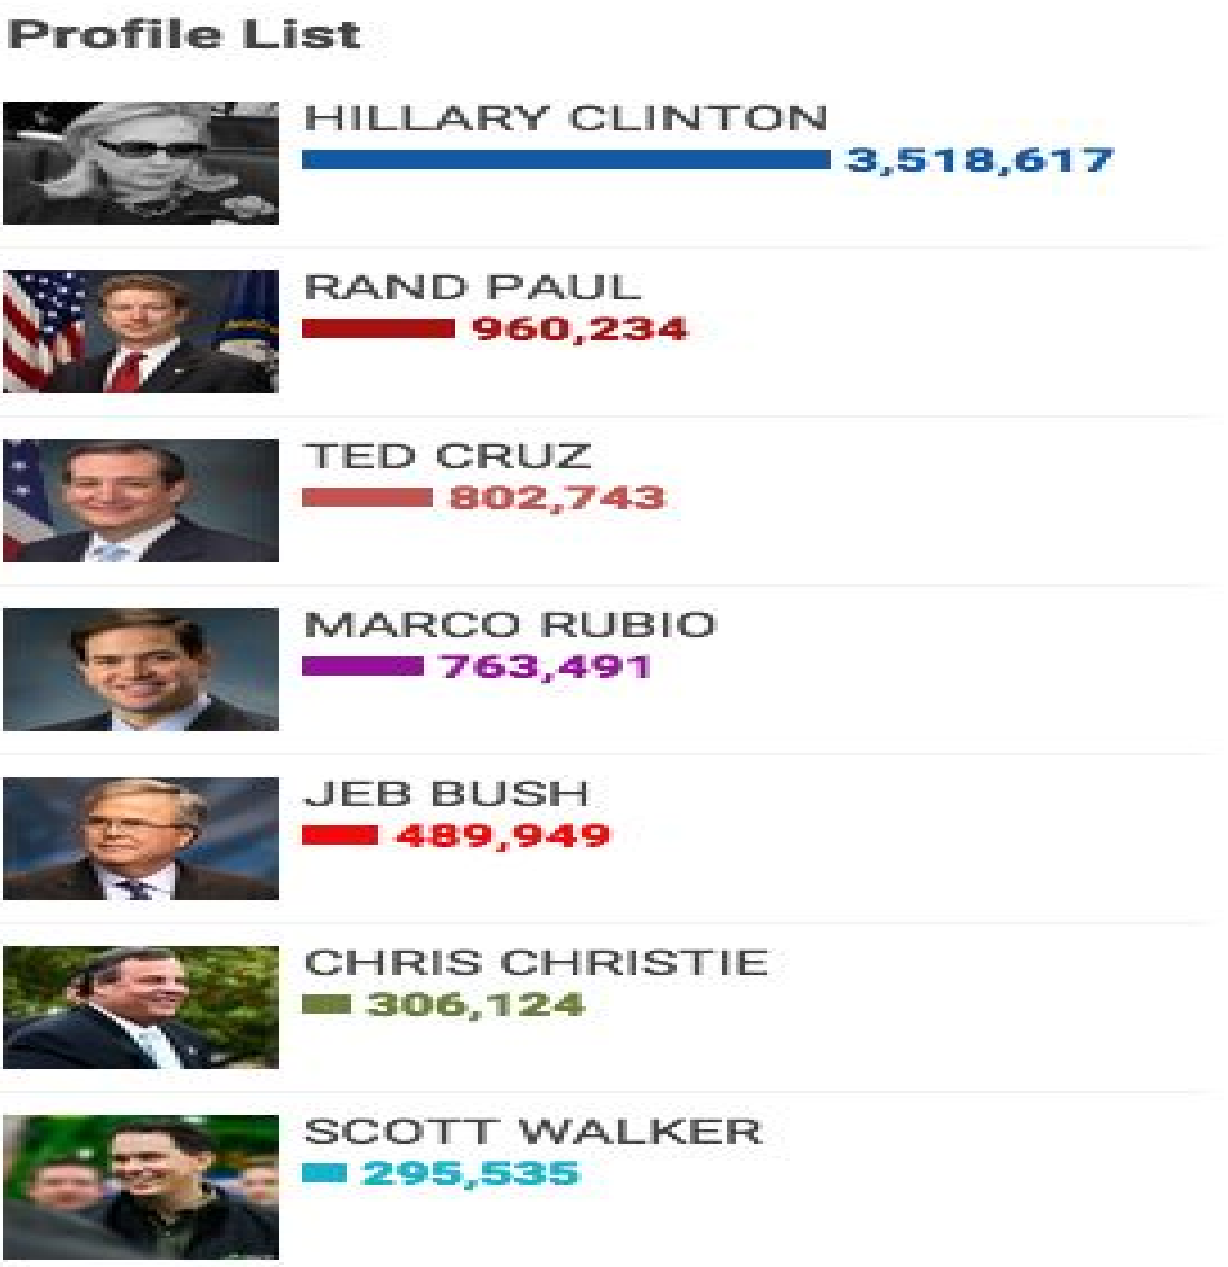
The image made sense at the time. Increasingly, it looks like a nostalgia piece. This August has tagged Paul's presidential bid as officially "embattled." Single-digit support in primary states; indictments for the two heads of his super PAC; a poorly-reviewed run at the first debate. "Whither Rand Paul" stories have been popping up for weeks, and Noah Rothman's Commentary story – "Rand Paul lost the libertarian moment" – is the harshest.

Draper politely declined to revisit his own article and argument, but I caught up with some of his sources. No one argues with this: The Paul campaign's struggle has quieted down the "libertarian moment" talk. The dream of Paul as a "frontrunner"-in-waiting was based on a few polls that showed his support in the high teens. For a brief time, it made sense for libertarians to hitch their wagons to the story of a thriving national politician. That's happening less now.

"It's a mistake to conflate Rand Paul's electoral success with that of the libertarian moment," said Nick Gillespie, the editor of Reason.com. (Disclosure: I worked for Reason from 2006 to 2008.) "Rand Paul's high visibility is better understood as a consequence of the libertarian moment than its cause. There's a reason why he's been at his most electrifying and popular precisely when he is at his most libertarian: calling out the surveillance state, for instance, and leading the charge against reckless interventions in Syria and Libya."

That gets to a grievance that some libertarian activists have expressed about Paul. Perhaps it was too much to hope that he could start with his father's 2012 coalition – one that cracked 20 percent in multiple states – and add new voters. Instead, Paul has failed to even unite self-identifying libertarian voters and donors. Charles and David Koch, who bankrolled much of the modern libertarian movement, have quite clearly been shopping around for a non-Paul candidate.

"The question is not whether the libertarian moment is over but whether libertarians can agree on a single national candidate," says Lawson Bader, the president of the free market Competitive Enterprise Institute. "The answer is probably "no," and if Rand Paul can't unite all the different strands of the movement, I am not convinced anybody else can right now. More importantly, the Republican primary has been 'Trumped,' upending everyone's previous understanding of political alliances."



In this read, there is no libertarian "moment" to lose. De-coupled from Paul, the causes of the movement – social liberalism, then a distrust-fueled dismantling of government – is humming right along. No Republican candidate, with the chaotic exception of Donald Trump, is proposing a state as large and "compassionate" as the last Republican president. It's really only on foreign policy that the libertarians have been quieted.

Libertarians have been here before. The media come asking about whether now, finally, their movement has won; the media decide that the moment has passed. Paul's campaign, for all its problems, is still going to be the lens through which everyone else tracks the movement's success. "Hopefully his father's endorsement will goad him to become THE libertarian alternative," says Gillespie, "rather than the seventh or eighth or 10th most conservative candidate in the GOP race." Read the full text of my Big Idea.

Our analytics partner Zignal Labs has some pretty dramatic evidence of Rand's fall. In April, when he announced his candidacy, Rand was mentioned more than any other GOP candidate by both social and traditional media (and just behind Hillary Clinton).

But over the last 30 days, eight of Paul's rivals — including Carly Fiorina, Ben Carson, and John Kasich — got more media love than the Kentucky senator, who received just three percent of the media's overall attention.

— The Pentagon plans to increase by 50 percent the number of daily drone flights by the U.S. military, the Wall Street Journal reports. The flights would "broaden intelligence collection in such locales as Ukraine, Iraq, Syria, the South China Sea and North Africa," a senior defense official told Gordon Lubold . "It would be the first significant increase in the U.S. drone program since 2011, reflecting pressure on military efforts to address a cascading series of global crises. While expanding surveillance, the Pentagon plan also grows the capacity for lethal airstrikes, the most controversial part of the U.S. drone program and its rapid growth under President Barack Obama Strikes by unmanned aircraft have killed 3,000 people or more, based on estimates by nonpartisan groups." By 2019, the Air Force would continue to fly 60 drone flight; the Army 16; and the Special Forces Command up to four.

TRUMP'S BIG WEEKEND:

Post reporters Philip Rucker and Jenna Johnson had this scene setter from the Iowa State Fair, where the GOP front-runner and business mogul landed his chopper on Saturday (and offered some Iowa kids a lift), waded through the crowds in his golf cart, and ate pork on a stick.

He boycotted the Des Moines Register's Soapbox (due to his ongoing feud with the editorial board). But he took selfies with the best of them before lifting off the Trumpcopter for greener pastures — er, or back to New York City.

Meanwhile, the real-estate mogul released a six-page immigration plan , seeking to answer critics who say he's woefully short on policy prescriptions. In it, he slammed the 2013 Senate reform bill as "amnesty, cheap labor and open borders" and a "giveaway to corporate patrons who run both parties." The proposal includes forcing Mexico to pay for a wall across the southern border; tripling Immigration and Customs Enforcement officers; imposing nationwide E-Verify for businesses to check citizenship claims; defunding sanctuary cities; and ending birthright citizenship. He wants to require businesses to hire Americans first; terminate the jobs program for foreign youth and replace it with a resume bank for inner-city youth; and use funds saved from cracking down on refugee and asylum seekers to place U.S. children without parents in safer homes and improve safety in high-crimes areas.

In an earlier appearance on "Meet the Press " with host Chuck Todd (who Trump has called a "real loser!"), Trump vowed to reverse President Obama's executive orders on immigration and deport all illegal immigrants. "We're going to keep the families together, but they have to go," he said in the interview.

GET SMART FAST:

1. Iran's Supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, said Monday that the Iran nuclear deal wouldn't allow American influence into his country. "We blocked this path and will definitely block it in the future. We won't allow American political, economic or cultural influence in Iran," Khamenei is quoted as saying . Meanwhile, GOP Sen. Jeff Flake (Ariz.) will oppose the nuclear deal, he announced over the weekend , meaning it might not get any Republican congressional support.

2. Two independent groups allied with Hillary Clinton are teaming up to mobilize female voters on behalf of the Democratic frontrunner, Matea Gold scoops. Priorities USA Action and EMILY's List will raise more than $20 million to target women, especially young ones, in swing states with the message that Republicans "would block access to health care for women and oppose fair pay."
3. A Fox News poll conducted of 1,008 registered voters from Aug. 11-13 showed Trump and Clinton still leading their respective fields. But on the GOP side, Ben Carson shows up in second place (13 points behind Trump) and Ted Cruz in 3rd; while Bernie Sanders is gaining on Clinton, taking 30 percent to her 49 percent.
4. Right to Rise, the super PAC allied with Jeb Bush, announced it will start to air a $10M ad buy starting in Iowa and New Hampshire on Sept. 15 and South Carolina a week later.
5. The Obama administration has warned China to stop the activities of its agents on U.S. soil aimed at pressuring "prominent expatriates — some wanted in China on charges of corruption — to return home immediately, according to American officials," reports the New York Times.

POWER PLAYERS IN THE NEWS:

1. John Kasich will nab the endorsemen t of Alabama Gov. Robert Bentley (R) on Monday morning, per the Post's Phil Rucker. Bentley's surprise nod shows that Kasich's support extends outside of the Midwest into the South and is a blow to his rivals.
2. Bernie Sanders said he hadn't authorized an apology note from a staffer to Black Lives Matter, arguing he didn't owe the group an apology – and adding he was the only candidate who would strongly fight racial injustice and a broken justice system.
3. Jeb Bush called Common Core "poisonous " at the Iowa State Fair. Bush explained he supports high state standards, but said the federal government should have no role in their creation.
4. On Fox News Sunday, Ben Carson defended his op-ed in the Jerusalem Post in which he suggested that President Obama's rhetoric was "anti-Semitic."
5. Mike Huckabee said he supports the decision by Paraguay to prevent a pregnant 10-year-old girl who was raped by her stepfather from getting an abortion. "I wouldn't pretend it's anything other than a terrible tragedy, But let's not compound the tragedy by taking yet another life," he told CNN's Dana Bash.
6. Julian Bond, 75, civil rights leader, ex-head of the Southern Poverty Law Center and former chairman of the NAACP, died of complications from vascular disease.

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

—"Congress's Awful Autumn," by Kelsey Snell: "When Congress returns from its August recess, it faces a tangle of fiscal deadlines that could serve as a replay of some of the most contentious battles of the past five years. Those include keeping the government open amid fierce disagreement over spending caps put in place by the so-called 2011 sequester, finding a long-term way to fund highway and transit projects and lifting the debt ceiling before default. Dispatching with all of these issues before year's end would be a big feat under even the most generous of circumstances, but they arrive as Congress will also be deciding whether to block the Iran nuclear deal, hosting a papal visit and dealing with a truncated September calendar due to religious holidays. For now, Republican leaders are preaching calm and assuring the agenda can be tackled without incident."

—"Minimum-Wage Offensive Could Speed Arrival of Robot Powered Restaurants," by Lydia DePillis: "The [restaurant] industry could be ready for another jolt as a ballot initiative to raise the minimum wage to $15 an hour nears in the District and as other campaigns to boost wages gain traction around the country. About 30 percent of the restaurant industry's costs come from salaries, so burger-flipping robots — or at least super-fast ovens that expedite the process — become that much more cost-competitive if the current federal minimum wage of $7.25 an hour is doubled…The labor-saving technology that has so far been rolled out most extensively — kiosk and tablet-based ordering — could be used to replace cashiers and the part of the wait staff's job that involves taking orders and bringing checks."

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

— New York Times, "With High-Profile Help, Obama Plots Life After Presidency," by Michael D. Shear and Gardiner Harris: "The dinner in the private upstairs dining room of the White House went so late that Reid Hoffman, the LinkedIn billionaire, finally suggested around midnight that President Obama might like to go to bed…He then lingered with his wife, Michelle, and their 13 guests — among them the novelist Toni Morrison, the hedge fund manager Marc Lasry and the Silicon Valley venture capitalist John Doerr…The long-running dinner this past February is part of a methodical effort taking place inside and outside the White House as the president, first lady and a cadre of top aides map out a postpresidential infrastructure and endowment they estimate could cost as much as $1 billion. The president's aides did not ask any of the guests for library contributions after the dinner, but a number of those at the table could be donors in the

The $1 billion — double what George W. Bush raised for his library and its various programs — would be used for what one adviser called a 'digital-first' presidential library loaded with modern technologies, and to establish a foundation with a worldwide reach."

— New York, "The Politics of Presidential Dieting, " by Marin Cogan: "This year's crop of presidential hopefuls is an unusually body-conscious bunch: They are challenging each other to pull-up contests (Rick Perry), bragging about their "gym rat" proclivities (Bobby Jindal), tossing away the garlic bread and scraping aside the pasta (Jeb Bush), and getting involved in push-up contests (Bobby Jindal, again)…But for the moment, we have arrived, more or less, at a general consensus against shaming female presidential candidates for their dietary habits — or at least, we know there'll be significant pushback for the idiots who try to. And to think, it only took a lifetime of Hillary enduring horrible sexism about her hair, makeup, and pantsuits to get there! The same cannot be said for the men. They must both try to lose weight and try not to lose their common touch — which requires the not-infrequent consumption of fried food and beer on the trail."

— Burlington (Vt.) Free Press, "Jane Sanders talks Bernie, politics and the possibility of winning," by Emilie Stigliani: "Sanders shares an office with her husband at campaign headquarters in Burlington, Vt., their desks side by side. Her role seems to merge the personal and the political. 'Right now it's being with Bernie. Traveling with him. Supporting him. And thinking through policy and strategy with him,' she said. 'So basically really supporting Bernie both in the way I always have both as a life partner in a loving couple, but also as a political adviser'…[Jane] Sanders said it's too soon to plan what she would do if her husband did win, but she would have a bridge-building approach to the first ladyship. 'I'd be more likely to build the bridges to the people we don't see eye to eye with,' she said. 'I'm a thinker. I think with empathy … It's more looking out at the people. And that includes the Republicans, you know the people that might be opposed to us. Trying to understand why is it that they want what they want. And then how do we find common ground.'"

Rosie O'Donnell hits back at Donald Trump's 'blood' comment. From Talking Points Memo: "After remaining relatively mum since the Republican presidential debate, actress Rosie O'Donnell fired back at Donald Trump for his 'shaming' comments about women and women's bodies … The comedienne said there's "a war on women happening in this country" which goes far beyond the real estate mogul. 'I'd like to take my period blood that I no longer have and write, 'You're all a–holes.' I'd like to smear it all over some people's faces,' she said."

HOT ON THE RIGHT

Obama can do Iran nuclear deal even if Congress disapproves. From the Associated Press : "The September vote on the Iran nuclear deal is billed as a titanic standoff between President Barack Obama and Congress. Yet even if lawmakers reject the agreement, it's not game-over for the White House … Obama doesn't need a congressional OK to give Iran most of the billions of dollars in relief from economic sanctions that it would get under the agreement, as long as Tehran honors its commitments to curb its nuclear program — at least for now."

DAYBOOK:

–What's happening today on the campaign trail: Scott Walker, Carly Fiorina and Lindsey Graham will speak at the Des Moines Register's soapbox at the Iowa State Fair. Fiorina will also attend an event in Kimballton, Iowa. John Kasich will participate in an Americans for Peace Prosperity and Security national security forum in Myrtle Beach, S.C. Jeb Bush will participate in a town hall with veterans in Columbia, S.C.

Hillary Clinton's opponents are trying to start a controversy where none exists. The Clinton Foundation is a totally non-political charity whose work saves and improves lives at home and around the world. Because of charitable contributions to the Foundation and its programs, 8 million people have benefited from lifesaving HIV/AIDS medications, 6,000 American schools are providing kids with healthy food choices in an effort to fight childhood obesity; 28,000 African farmers have improved their crops; and 248 million tons of greenhouse gas emissions are being reduced in cities worldwide. The Clinton Global Initiative brings together people from business, labor, government, and the non-profit world to solve problems without politics or gridlock. Republican opponents want to confuse voters about the Clinton Foundation and its donors because all this good work is proof that what Hillary cares about most is helping hard-working people and families build better lives.

BAE Systems has named Dr. John Gannon as vice president for Global Analysis, a new line of business formed within BAE Systems Information Technology.

Gannon joins BAE Systems after serving as Staff Director of the House Homeland Security Committee, the first new committee established by Congress in more than thirty years. In 2002-2003, he was a team leader in the White House's Transitional Planning Office for the Department of Homeland Security. He served previously in the senior-most analytic positions in the Intelligence Community, including CIA's Director of European Analysis, Deputy Director for Intelligence, Chairman of the National Intelligence Council, and Assistant Director of Central Intelligence for Analysis and Production. In the private sector, he developed the analytic workforce for Intellibridge Corporation, a web-based provider of outsourced analysis for government and corporate clients.

Gannon served as a naval officer in Southeast Asia and later in several Naval Reserve commands; retiring as a Captain. He was also elected to the Falls Church, Va., City Council and was subsequently appointed to the city's Planning Commission and later to the city's Economic Development Commission and Charter Review Commission.

Gannon holds a bachelor's degree from Holy Cross College in Worcester, Mass., and master's and doctorate degrees from Washington University in St. Louis. He is an adjunct professor in the National Security Studies Program at Georgetown University.

We've also found it successful when chatting with folks to frame energy/climate as integral to each of her four fights:

- investing in clean energy that will power the economy of the future

- protecting families from pollution

- safeguarding our country from the impacts of climate change and reducing our oil dependence

- preventing those who want to keep us trapped in the energy economy of the past from distorting our political process.

Note From Trevor Houser:

"Not sure if comms gave John background, but the reporter has been asking about HRC's process for a climate and enviro policy. Jake and the team felt now was an appropriate time to work with Ben Geman on that story in an effort to:

1) underscore how seriously she takes these issues;
2) Climate and Environment are top priorities for the campaign; and
3) The campaign is leading a deliberate and thoughtful policy process that has sought input from a large number of experts and key stakeholders in the environment, clean energy, and conservation communities.

The one other thing I would flag for John is that if Ben asks whether we would support a permanent extension of the PTC/ITC we need to hedge given out solar/renewable targets. Those imply a $10-$15 billion per year price tag by 2020 and $25-$35 billion per year by 2027 if extended at current levels. May need to call for "extending and improving" or something like that."

Secretary of State Record

As Secretary, Hillary fought hard to mobilize a global response to climate change. She immediately created the first high-level post at the State Department dedicated exclusively to climate diplomacy (the US Special Envoy for Climate Change)

She put climate squarely on the agenda during her first trip as Secretary to Beijing

Hillary worked to feature climate change in the annual US-China Strategic and Economic Dialogue meeting

She helped to hammer out the breakthrough that led to the Copenhagen Accord, which, among other things, was the first international agreement in which all of the major economies – including China – committed to reduce their greenhouse gas pollution.

In addition, she worked hard as Secretary to build new coalitions to combat emissions from methane and other super-pollutants that damage the climate, as well as to launch a clean cookstove initiative that is bringing not only health but climate benefits.

In pursuing these international agreements, and the leadership we are showing at home and abroad, the United States now has a much stronger hand to play in the upcoming negotiations in Paris.

Re: Energy, Climate and Environment Policy Platform

This memo provides a brief overview of our proposed energy, climate and environment policy platform. We have developed six major policy initiatives that together offer a comprehensive strategy for a) protecting American families from pollution, b) powering the economy of the future, c) delivering energy and climate security that lasts, and d) responsibly stewarding our country's natural bounty and beauty. We are finalizing separate white papers with more detail on each of the six initiatives.

Our platform is designed to make the US the clean energy superpower of the 21st century and a global leader in the fight against climate change, and to do so in a way that provides economic opportunity and security for all Americans. We will have half a billion solar panels installed across the country by 2020 and generate enough renewable energy to power every home in the country within 10 years. During that time we will reduce US oil consumption by 20% and partner with other countries bring global oil demand growth to a halt [note: this is a proposed target we haven't yet discussed as a group].

The next decade is critical if we are going to successfully transition to a clean energy economy, deliver security that lasts, and prevent catastrophic climate change. The following is an ambitious and achievable plan of attack.

1. Smart Standards

We will fight efforts to roll back environmental protections in favor of polluters. We will defend and extend common-sense standards that make our air and water cleaner, safeguard the health of our families, reduce energy waste, driven clean energy deployment and fight global climate change. This includes full implementation of the Clean Power Plan, extension of efficiency standards for cars, trucks, airplanes and appliances, better building codes, mandatory disclosure of fracking chemicals and methane regulations on oil and gas production.

2. Clean Energy Challenge

Standards set the floor, not the ceiling. We can and must go further. We will form a new partnership with states, cities and rural communities that are ready to lead, providing competitive grants to those that exceed federal guidelines, remove barriers to clean energy access and entrepreneurship, and invest in innovative solutions that reduce energy costs, protect public health and cut carbon pollution.

As part of this bargain, we will guarantee that every agency within the federal government is working in concert to ensure Americans have the tools and resources they need to succeed. That includes investing in new technologies, both in our labs and through our tax code, and ensuring that we are maximizing the clean energy potential of public lands and public buildings. We will expand successful innovation initiatives, like ARPA-e, cut those that fail to deliver results, and ensure that public R&D supports private sector entrepreneurialism, small business creation and employment growth.

3. Modernizing North American Infrastructure

We must improve the safety and security of existing energy infrastructure in North America and ensure that the new infrastructure we build is consistent with the clean energy economy we are seeking to create. We will launch a major initiative to repair, replace and better regulate our existing pipeline and rail network to protect our families, communities, and outdoor economy from the risk of oil spills and explosions and protect the climate from fugitive methane emissions. And we'll negotiate a North American Climate Compact with Canada and Mexico that guides future infrastructure investment on the continent through ambitious emission reduction commitments, coordinated policy action, and strong accountability mechanisms.

Security that Lasts

The recent growth in domestic oil and gas production provides important economic and geopolitical benefits, but it doesn't solve the energy-related security issues that have plagued our country for decades. US gasoline prices will continue to be set by the global market, no matter how much oil we produce, leaving our economy vulnerable to supply disruptions elsewhere in the world. In addition, the more oil and other fossil fuels we burn, the more risk we bear – both to our economy and our national security - from higher sea levels and increasingly devastating storms, heatwaves and droughts.

The only way to truly safeguard our country is to reduce the amount of oil consumed both at home and around the world and make our investments, our communities and our infrastructure more resilient to climate-related risks. We will take actions necessary to drive down oil consumption in the US, and will partner with other countries to halt the growth in global oil consumption within the next ten years. We will lead the world in combatting climate change, build resilient infrastructure and ensure American families, businesses and investors have actionable information on the kinds of risks they face.

Collaborative Stewardship

We are still developing the public lands/conservation leg of the platform, which will include the following components:

1. Royalty reform: Raise the on-shore oil and gas royalty rate on public lands to match that charged on private lands in Texas and other states and close the loophole in coal royalty policy that costs taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars per year.

2. Leasing: Take areas too sensitive for energy production, like the Arctic, off the table.

3. LWCF: Fully fund the Land and Water Conservation Fund

4. Outdoor economy: Support the growth of the outdoor economy by protecting national parks and forests and improving access to public lands for hunters and anglers and other types of recreation.

A Just Transition

As we build the energy economy of the 21st century, we cannot turn our backs on the workers and communities in the coalfields who kept the lights on and factories running during the 20th century. We will ensure that the retirement benefits of coal miners and their families are secure, invest in carbon capture, utilization and sequestration technology, and launch a major workforce and local economic development initiative for coalfield communities from Central Appalachia to the Powder River Basin.

We will also address the legacy costs fossil fuel combustion in communities disproportionately impacted by the resulting air pollution. We will provide block grants to states, cities and rural communities that develop innovative economic development and public health solutions for vulnerable communities as part of their clean energy strategy, such as the SB 535 program in California.

Subject:	Iran Nuclear Agreement

Dear Jake,

As I have mentioned, for over three years I have chaired the Iran Task Force of the Atlantic Council, the first year as co-chair with Chuck Hagel. We have done extensive work of the Iran nuclear issue, Iranian internal politics and their foreign policy goals, publishing more than a dozen papers.

Along the lines of the previous notes to you about the emerging Iran Nuclear Agreement, it appears increasingly clear there will be a framework agreement by or before March 24, which will set the parameters in some detail of the obligations of Iran and the phase-out of sanctions. The sanctions relief will entail not only the exercise of presidential waiver authority in congressionally imposed sanctions, but the U.S. going to the UN and seeking sanctions relief there, as well. The latter would have the force of international law.

Obviously, with the 47 Republican Senator letter, Bibi's congressional speech, the distinct possibility Bibi will be the prime minister again (exit polls as of this moment are 27-27 between Likud and Labor, and Bibi can more easily get to 61 seats than Herzog), and that the Saudis, Egyptians, Gulf States, as well as Israel and most of the organized Jewish community, will have great problems with the Agreement, this presents a very difficult issue for Secretary Clinton.

I start with the premise that having been Secretary of State and being involved in earlier phases of the negotiations, and being a Democrat, she has to endorse the outcome. But permit me to suggest that she should take a harder line on a number of issues.

She could say something along these lines, subject to modification when the details are published:

"Given the development of Iran's nuclear program, this Agreement, while far from perfect, offers the best way to constrain Iran from getting a bomb. It reduces the number of active centrifuges enriching uranium, and places limits on the number and quality of centrifuges for the next 10 (or 15 years). It would send most of the enriched uranium out of Iran for reprocessing in ways that makes it highly unlikely it could be used to make a bomb. It would limit enriched uranium to low levels (around 5%). It also places strict limits on the heavy-water plutonium plant at Arak, which would potentially be another way for Iran to develop a nuclear weapon. It would limit the underground facility at Fordow to research and development. It provides for intrusive 24/7 inspections by the respected International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), under the additional Protocol of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. And sanctions would be only gradually withdrawn, based upon Iranian performance (check on details). It creates a one year (check) breakout period, in which the U.S. and our allies would have notice if Iran decided to pursue a nuclear weapon. Moreover, 10 (or 15) years is a long time and Iran's conduct may moderate.

Without this Agreement, Iran would be free to develop its plutonium facility at Arak; would continue to increase the number and sophistication of its centrifuges (indeed has another 10,000 waiting on line); would not be subject to intrusive inspections; and could make more progress toward a nuclear weapon. It has added more centrifuges during the course of the severe sanctions already imposed.

Because we already have the most comprehensive sanctions ever exacted in peacetime against Iran (its private banks out of the SWIFT clearance system; the Central Bank of Iran on the sanctions list; the EU taking no Iranian oil exports; etc.), it is difficult to see any set of additional sanctions which would lead to a better result. While we must keep the military option on the table if Iran moves forward with a weapons system, this Agreement is the best opportunity to avoid the need for military action.

We also have to recognize that one of the reasons sanctions helped bring Iran to the negotiating table is that we were able to forge a partnership with the European Union. If we fail to endorse this Agreement, there is a real possibility the EU would remove its sanctions, and the U.S. would be left alone, with sanctions that would be less effective.

At the same time, there are important gaps in the Agreement. It does not cover Iran's ballistic missile program, which would not exist if Iran simply wanted a civilian nuclear program. It does not require Iran to answer the IAEA's questions about its potential military-related testing of equipment, which was one of the reasons for the UN sanctions (check on final product). It does not permit full inspection at military facilities, like Parchin. It leaves Iran with an industrial-size nuclear facility. And at the end of the 10 (or 15) year period, Iran would be unconstrained.

Therefore, while this Agreement is an important step forward to limit Iran's nuclear weapons ambitions, we must take additional steps to assure that Iran does not pursue a breakout strategy either during or after the expiration of the Agreement. The U.S. strategy should include the following:

1. The toughest sanctions possible should be given to the next President to employ if Iran cheats during the course of the Agreement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2. Even after the expiration of the Agreement, Iran should know that if it pursues a nuclear weapons strategy, the U.S. would consider this unacceptable, and would take all actions necessary to prevent it.

3. The U.S. should insist that Iran "come clean" and answer all of the IAEA's questions to their satisfaction.

4. The U.S. should do everything possible to limit Iran's development of long-range missiles.

5. The U.S. should assure our friends and allies in the region, Israel, Saudi Arabia, the countries of the Gulf Cooperation Council, Egypt, Jordan, and others that this Agreement will not lead to across-the-board cooperation with Iran on issues like Iraq, Syria, Lebanon, Gaza, Afghanistan, where directly or through surrogates Iran is acting in ways contrary to U.S. national security interests and those of our friends and allies. Iran has provided the equipment and training of IEDs and other weapons which have killed American soldiers. Their interests and ours diverge in important ways. We will never forsake our friends, and should begin immediate consultations to provide defense arrangements to reassure them of our continued support and constancy. We will do everything possible to limit Iran's efforts at regional hegemony at the expense of our friends and allies. We will build up our forces in the Persian Gulf to demonstrate this."

Jake, these are some preliminary thoughts. But I do believe Secretary Clinton cannot afford to take a pass on this Agreement, or simply endorse it without these caveats.

Best wishes,

With a long and divisive primary fight finally behind them, the bulk of the national Democratic leadership joined forces today to tout the candidacy of Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and to bash Sen. Remarks of Senator Barack Obama -- Final Primary Night

Tues., June 3, 2008 19:02:11 ET

Tonight, after fifty-four hard-fought contests, our primary season has finally come to an end.

Sixteen months have passed since we first stood together on the steps of the Old State Capitol in Springfield, Illinois. Thousands of miles have been traveled. Millions of voices have been heard. And because of what you said -- because you decided that change must come to Washington; because you believed that this year must be different than all the rest; because you chose to listen not to your doubts or your fears but to your greatest hopes and highest aspirations, tonight we mark the end of one historic journey with the beginning of another -- a journey that will bring a new and better day to America. Tonight, I can stand before you and say that I will be the Democratic nominee for President of the United States.

I want to thank every American who stood with us over the course of this campaign -- through the good days and the bad; from the snows of Cedar Rapids to the sunshine of Sioux Falls. And tonight I also want to thank the men and woman who took this journey with me as fellow candidates for President.

At this defining moment for our nation, we should be proud that our party put forth one of the most talented, qualified field of individuals ever to run for this office. I have not just competed with them as rivals, I have learned from them as friends, as public servants, and as patriots who love America and are willing to work tirelessly to make this country better. They are leaders of this party, and leaders that America will turn to for years to come.

That is particularly true for the candidate who has traveled further on this journey than anyone else. Senator Hillary Clinton has made history in this campaign not just because she's a woman who has done what no woman has done before, but because she's a leader who inspires millions of Americans with her strength, her courage, and her commitment to the causes that brought us here tonight.

We've certainly had our differences over the last sixteen months. But as someone who's shared a stage with her many times, I can tell you that what gets Hillary Clinton up in the morning -- even in the face of tough odds -- is exactly what sent her and Bill Clinton to sign up for their first campaign in Texas all those years ago; what sent her to work at the Children's Defense Fund and made her fight for health care as First Lady; what led her to the United States Senate and fueled her barrier-breaking campaign for the presidency -- an unyielding desire to improve the lives of ordinary Americans, no matter how difficult the fight may be. And you can rest assured that when we finally win the battle for universal health care in this country, she will be central to that victory. When we transform our energy policy and lift our children out of poverty, it will be because she worked to help make it happen. Our party and our country are better off because of her, and I am a better candidate for having had the honor to compete with Hillary Rodham Clinton.

There are those who say that this primary has somehow left us weaker and more divided. Well I say that because of this primary, there are millions of Americans who have cast their ballot for the very first time. There are Independents and Republicans who understand that this election isn't just about the party in charge of Washington, it's about the need to change Washington.Ê There are young people, and African-Americans, and Latinos, and women of all ages who have voted in numbers that have broken records and inspired a nation.

All of you chose to support a candidate you believe in deeply. But at the end of the day, we aren't the reason you came out and waited in lines that stretched block after block to make your voice heard. You didn't do that because of me or Senator Clinton or anyone else. You did it because you know in your hearts that at this moment -- a moment that will define a generation -- we cannot afford to keep doing what we've been doing. We owe our children a better future. We owe our country a better future. And for all those who dream of that future tonight, I say -- let us begin the work together. Let us unite in common effort to chart a new course for America.

In just a few short months, the Republican Party will arrive in St. Paul with a very different agenda. They will come here to nominate John McCain, a man who has served this country heroically. I honor that service, and I respect his many accomplishments, even if he chooses to deny mine. My differences with him are not personal; they are with the policies he has proposed in this campaign.

Because while John McCain can legitimately tout moments of independence from his party in the past, such independence has not been the hallmark of his presidential campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's not change when John McCain decided to stand with George Bush ninety-five percent of the time, as he did in the Senate last year.

It's not change when he offers four more years of Bush economic policies that have failed to create well-paying jobs, or insure our workers, or help Americans afford the skyrocketing cost of college -- policies that have lowered the real incomes of the average American family, widened the gap between Wall Street and Main Street, and left our children with a mountain of debt.ÊÊÊ

And it's not change when he promises to continue a policy in Iraq that asks everything of our brave men and women in uniform and nothing of Iraqi politicians -- a policy where all we look for are reasons to stay in Iraq, while we spend billions of dollars a month on a war that isn't making the American people any safer.

So I'll say this -- there are many words to describe John McCain's attempt to pass off his embrace of George Bush's policies as bipartisan and new. But change is not one of them.

Change is a foreign policy that doesn't begin and end with a war that should've never been authorized and never been waged. I won't stand here and pretend that there are many good options left in Iraq, but what's not an option is leaving our troops in that country for the next hundred years -- especially at a time when our military is overstretched, our nation is isolated, and nearly every other threat to America is being ignored.

We must be as careful getting out of Iraq as we were careless getting in - but start leaving we must. It's time for Iraqis to take responsibility for their future. It's time to rebuild our military and give our veterans the care they need and the benefits they deserve when they come home. It's time to refocus our efforts on al Qaeda's leadership and Afghanistan, and rally the world against the common threats of the 21st century -- terrorism and nuclear weapons; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. That's what change is.

Change is realizing that meeting today's threats requires not just our firepower, but the power of our diplomacy -- tough, direct diplomacy where the President of the United States isn't afraid to let any petty dictator know where America stands and what we stand for. We must once again have the courage and conviction to lead the free world. That is the legacy of Roosevelt, and Truman, and Kennedy. That's what the American people want. That's what change is.Ê

Change is building an economy that rewards not just wealth, but the work and workers who created it. It's understanding that the struggles facing working families can't be solved by spending billions of dollars on more tax breaks for big corporations and wealthy CEOs, but by giving a the middle-class a tax break, and investing in our crumbling infrastructure, and transforming how we use energy, and improving our schools, and renewing our commitment to science and innovation. It's understanding that fiscal responsibility and shared prosperity can go hand-in-hand, as they did when Bill Clinton was President.

John McCain has spent a lot of time talking about trips to Iraq in the last few weeks, but maybe if he spent some time taking trips to the cities and towns that have been hardest hit by this economy -- cities in Michigan, and Ohio, and right here in Minnesota -- he'd understand the kind of change that people are looking for.

Maybe if he went to Iowa and met the student who works the night shift after a full day of class and still can't pay the medical bills for a sister who's ill, he'd understand that she can't afford four more years of a health care plan that only takes care of the healthy and wealthy. She needs us to pass health care plan that guarantees insurance to every American who wants it and brings down premiums for every family who needs it. That's the change we need.

Maybe if he went to Pennsylvania and met the man who lost his job but can't even afford the gas to drive around and look for a new one, he'd understand that we can't afford four more years of our addiction to oil from dictators. That man needs us to pass an energy policy that works with automakers to raise fuel standards, and makes corporations pay for their pollution, and oil companies invest their record profits in a clean energy future -- an energy policy that will create millions of new jobs that pay well and can't be outsourced. That's the change we need.

And maybe if he spent some time in the schools of South Carolina or St. Paul or where he spoke tonight in New Orleans, he'd understand that we can't afford to leave the money behind for No Child Left Behind; that we owe it to our children to invest in early childhood education; to recruit an army of new teachers and give them better pay and more support; to finally decide that in this global economy, the chance to get a college education should not be a privilege for the wealthy few, but the birthright of every American. That's the change we need in America. That's why I'm running for President.

The other side will come here in September and offer a very different set of policies and positions, and that is a debate I look forward to. It is a debate the American people deserve. But what you don't deserve is another election that's governed by fear, and innuendo, and division. What you won't hear from this campaign or this party is the kind of politics that uses religion as a wedge, and patriotism as a bludgeon -- that sees our opponents not as competitors to challenge, but enemies to demonize. Because we may call ourselves Democrats and Republicans, but we are Americans first. We are always Americans first.

Despite what the good Senator from Arizona said tonight, I have seen people of differing views and opinions find common cause many times during my two decades in public life, and I have brought many together myself. I've walked arm-in-arm with community leaders on the South Side of Chicago and watched tensions fade as black, white, and Latino fought together for good jobs and good schools. I've sat across the table from law enforcement and civil rights advocates to reform a criminal justice system that sent thirteen innocent people to death row. And I've worked with friends in the other party to provide more children with health insurance and more working families with a tax break; to curb the spread of nuclear weapons and ensure that the American people know where their tax dollars are being spent; and to reduce the influence of lobbyists who have all too often set the agenda in Washington.

In our country, I have found that this cooperation happens not because we agree on everything, but because behind all the labels and false divisions and categories that define us; beyond all the petty bickering and point-scoring in Washington, Americans are a decent, generous, compassionate people, united by common challenges and common hopes. And every so often, there are moments which call on that fundamental goodness to make this country great again.

So it was for that band of patriots who declared in a Philadelphia hall the formation of a more perfect union; and for all those who gave on the fields of Gettysburg and Antietam their last full measure of devotion to save that same union.

So it was for the Greatest Generation that conquered fear itself, and liberated a continent from tyranny, and made this country home to untold opportunity and prosperity.

So it was for the workers who stood out on the picket lines; the women who shattered glass ceilings; the children who braved a Selma bridge for freedom's cause.

So it has been for every generation that faced down the greatest challenges and the most improbable odds to leave their children a world that's better, and kinder, and more just.

And so it must be for us.

America, this is our moment. This is our time. Our time to turn the page on the policies of the past. Our time to bring new energy and new ideas to the challenges we face. Our time to offer a new direction for the country we love.

The journey will be difficult. The road will be long. I face this challenge with profound humility, and knowledge of my own limitations. But I also face it with limitless faith in the capacity of the American people. Because if we are willing to work for it, and fight for it, and believe in it, then I am absolutely certain that generations from now, we will be able to look back and tell our children that this was the moment when we began to provide care for the sick and good jobs to the jobless; this was the moment when the rise of the oceans began to slow and our planet began to heal; this was the moment when we ended a war and secured our nation and restored our image as the last, best hope on Earth. This was the moment -- this was the time -- when we came together to remake this great nation so that it may always reflect our very best selves, and our highest ideals. Thank you, God Bless you, and may God Bless the United States of America.Ê

US Condemns Israel's Jordan Valley Land Expansion

Washington condemned Israel's plan to appropriate West Bank land near Jericho, saying the action called into question Jerusalem's commitment to a two-state solution with the Palestinians. The Defense Ministry said earlier in the day that officials approved the expropriation of some 370 acres West Bank agricultural land near the Palestinian city of Jericho, the largest such move since August 2014. "We strongly oppose any steps that could accelerate settlement expansion and we believe they're fundamentally incompatible with a two-state solution and call into question frankly the Israeli government's commitment to a two-state solution," State Department spokesman Mark Toner said.

Ban Ki-Moon Condemns New Israeli Land Appropriation Plan

UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon said that he was deeply concerned about reports that Israel intended to appropriate 1,500 dunams of land south of Jericho. A short time ago, Ban released a statement saying that if this took place, this would be the largest appropriation in the last 1.5 years. He again called on Israel to take steps to improve the lives of the Palestinians and stressed that the settlements violated international law and were in contradiction of Israel's statements that it was committed to the two-state solution.

Hezbollah Is Getting Most Sophisticated Russian Weapons

"Russian weapons, Moscow's most advanced, are already in Hezbollah's possession," Gen. (res.) Yaakov Amidror said at the end of last week, while speaking to a group of new immigrants at a Midrasha Zionit event in Petah Tikva. Amidror, who was head of the National Security Council two years ago and an adviser to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, said that the sophisticated weapons reached Hezbollah as a result of the Syrian civil war.

Palestinian Hardliners Blast Security Cooperation with Israel

Palestinian factions on Wednesday strongly condemned Palestinian Authority security commander Majed Faraj for his talk about security coordination with Israel. Faraj, in an interview Sunday with Defense News, revealed that the PA security forces have prevented some 200 terrorist attacks against Israel since October 2015. He also revealed that his forces have arrested about 100 Palestinians on suspicion of planning attacks against Israelis. Faraj is the commander of the PA's General Intelligence Force in the West Bank. His remarks triggered a wave of denunciations from a number of Palestinian factions that are strongly opposed to security coordination with Israel.

Residents Anxious as IDF Deploys Artillery Batteries Near Gaza

In an unusual step, the IDF has deployed artillery batteries along the border with Gaza in response to last week's attempted bombing attack in the northern section of Gaza. The artillery batteries have been stationed along with soldiers deployed in the area. Over the past seven years, artillery batteries have been deployed during times of a sharp increase in attacks coming from Hamas or during IDF military action against Gaza. The batteries offer a quick and destructive response to attacks emanating from open areas.

State Won't Aid Palestinians Facing Death for Selling Jews Land

More than 95 percent of Palestinians who appeal for help from Israeli courts or authorities because their lives are endangered, due to their cooperation with Israel, are denied asylum or protection, Ha'aretz has found. In a typical case, the High Court of Justice last week rejected a petition from a West Bank Palestinian who sought protection because his life was in danger. His community suspected he had cooperated with Israel and had been involved in selling land to Jews.

Israel Eyes Improved Ties w/ Gulf States After Foothold in UAE

Israel hopes that its relationship with Arab Gulf states will continue to improve after ties with countries including the United Arab Emirates have grown in recent years over issues including opposition to Iran, officials and regional experts have told Middle East Eye. On Monday Israeli Energy Minister Yuval Steinitz returned from a "secret trip" to Abu Dhabi where he discussed "shared concerns" over Iran, the Islamic State (IS), and other undisclosed matters. The report said the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs is interested in opening an office in Abu Dhabi, following on from the December 2015 announcement that Israel was opening its public office in the UAE at the Abu Dhabi headquarters of the International Renewable Energy Agency (IRENA).

Beware of Hezbollah, Preparing for Hamas

By Alex Fishman

Institutionalized terrorism—to wit, shooting attacks, roadside bombings, car bombings and suicide bombing attacks with the support of terror organizations and regimes such as Iran—are on their way back to the West Bank and from there quite possibly into Green Line Israel as well. That is the true face of the wave of terrorism that is currently being prepared behind the scenes and which threatens to take the place of the wave of spontaneous and popular terrorism featuring lone assailants bearing knives and using vehicles as their weapons.

Senior security officials have been monitoring with concern the decision that Hamas's military leadership in the Gaza Strip has made in recent months: to renew its terror attacks in the West Bank and Israel, even at the cost of a full-scale conflagration with Israel. Senior Israeli security officials say that Hamas, a year and a half after Operation Protective Edge, feels that it has achieved a sufficient degree of readiness to traverse another war with Israel. From Israel's perspective, that is of strategic significance: in the course of this coming year it is liable to find itself in another conflagration in the Gaza Strip.

Hezbollah, for the time being, is a marginal player in terms of the institutionalized terrorist infrastructure in the West Bank. The exposure of the Hezbollah terror cell in Tulkarm is testament to the effort that Hezbollah has been making to regain its foothold on the Palestinian front—as it did during the second Intifada when 70% of the Fatah cells that operated against Israel did so under Nasrallah's patronage. Hezbollah believes the Palestinian front to be a primary front that will allow it to operate against Israel without setting Lebanon's southern border on fire. But Hezbollah's penetration into the West Bank still has a long way to go.

The real story is Hamas. Several weeks ago the GSS tracked down a Hamas network in the West Bank, which included a bomb factory and preparations to dispatch a suicide bomber to an attack in Jerusalem. Hamas's military wing in the Gaza Strip, which commanded the network, was working on the assumption that Israel would not be able to refrain from acting in the face of a murderous terror attack in the heart of the capital. Its assessment was that Israel would respond aggressively in Judea and Samaria—which would include damaging the Palestinian Authority—and would carry out retaliatory operations in the Gaza Strip in tandem.

The alarms have been sounding in Israel for several months. The assessment is that Hamas has taken the liberty of staging bombing attacks in the West Bank because it has completed the initial preparations needed to deliver the "surprise blow" that it failed to deliver a year and a half ago on the eve of Operation Protective Edge. It is not unlikely that this will involve infiltration into Israel—from the air, the sea and tunnels—under the cover of massive mortar shell and rocket fire so as to inflict maximal casualties on Israel. Hamas has also developed a doctrine that involves delivering an opening blow that will shock the Israelis and serve as a form of Palestinian revenge for the opening blow that Israel delivered in Operation Pillar of Defense, in which dozens of Hamas police officers were killed in a police installation in Gaza.

It seems that Hamas has completed at least part of its rehabilitation work in the Gaza Strip. The network of offensive tunnels that penetrate Israeli territory has apparently already been rebuilt and based on past experience, those tunnels have several exit points each.

Furthermore Hamas's special forces and frogmen have continued to train intensively, its unmanned aerial vehicle division has been rebuilt and the arsenal of rockets has been partially replenished.

While it is true that the network that was planning the suicide bombing attack in Jerusalem was arrested, it was not alone. General Freij, the commander of the Palestinian Authority's security forces, told the American media that his troops had recently arrested 300 Hamas members.

At the start of the current wave of terrorism some four months ago, Hamas in Gaza and its commanders in Istanbul encouraged the Palestinians to commit acts of violence, and they celebrated the perpetrators of the stabbing and vehicular attacks. At that point, Hamas was encouraging the wave of terrorism but had not yet crossed the line by activating terror cells it had in the West Bank, for fear of Israeli retaliation. Hamas's strategy was to try to undermine the stability of Abu Mazen's regime by means of cultivating unrest on the Palestinian street. Meanwhile, the Israeli assessment was that Hamas was preoccupied with rebuilding its strength, was suffering from economic distress because of its loss of Iran's support and had been dealt a painful blow by Egypt, which had shut down a significant part of its smuggling tunnels. The Israeli assessment was that Hamas lacked the capabilities and the will to risk clashing with the IDF.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That assessment in Israel changed when it became evident that Hamas has instructed its men in the West Bank to resume bombing attacks inside the Green Line. Indeed, Hamas's terror cells in the West Bank have been reactivated and several bomb factories have already been discovered. Money has also begun to flow to those terror cells, envoys have already been dispatched and have visited the West Bank. It is clear today that Hamas—under the leadership of Mohammed Deif—has changed its course and has upped the ante with Israel.

Rebooting Israeli-Turkish Relations

By Robert M. Cutler

The political earthquake between Saudi Arabia and Iran has overshadowed the news, in early January, about the possibility of a diplomatic reconciliation between Turkey and Israel. This news included the possibility of Israel exporting natural gas to Turkey. The link between the Turkey-Israel and the Saudi-Iran questions is not a simple one.

There have been rumors before about a Turkish-Israeli reconciliation that did not come to pass. This time, notably, it was the liberal Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz that "leaked" this story, perhaps to apply political pressure inside Israel for approval of the deal. But even so, Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdoğan has said that he has not seen its specific provisions.

Although this Turkish-Israeli rapprochement has been in the works for some time, the initiative may be seen from Turkey's side, in the context of the recent Turkish-Russian rift, as an attempt to move Israel away from Russia. From that standpoint, it is unlikely to work. Israel needs aerial co-ordination with Russia over Syrian airspace. Arrangements for this have been made, and they have been working.

Also, Israel will never agree to unrestricted resupply of the Gaza Strip from Turkey. Although creative diplomacy may arrange for verification of shipments, for example, via Cyprus where they could be inspected, the overall economics suggest that Turkey needs Israel more than Israel needs Turkey.

Rapprochement would suit both … but in the end, Ankara needs it more.

It is true that Israel wants markets for its newly discovered natural gas, and that Turkey wants to reduce dependence on Russian gas. It would be difficult, however, for Israel to rely on Turkey for transit of gas to Europe in light of recent bilateral relations. The proposed Eastern Mediterranean pipeline from Israel's offshore through Cyprus (which has also its own gas for export) to Greece, and from there into Italy or the Balkans, makes Turkey unnecessary as a transit country.

How does this affect the Saudi-Iranian equation? Israel has greatly improved its intelligence co-operation with Saudi Arabia, which has in turn established strong relations with the new Egyptian regime. Yet it is an open secret that the Muslim Brotherhood operates easily in Turkey in order to oppose and attack Egypt, including underground and military operations on Egyptian soil.

Israeli-Egyptian co-operation in the Sinai has greatly improved. From this standpoint, Israel has little motive potentially to displease these two states, Saudi Arabia and Egypt, with which it has strong common interests, by re-establishing relations with Turkey, which militantly opposes both regimes in power.

Turkey may wish to play peace broker between Saudi Arabia and Iran, but Russia has already offered itself for this role. It is natural if Iran were forced to choose, then it would prefer Russia; and if Saudi Arabia were forced to choose, then it would prefer Turkey. Yet there is little prospect of Turkey and Russia co-operating together in this direction.

The balance is not simple. Turkey is an important player in the region but it must be careful not to appear weak in relation to the situation in Syria, or else it would lose diplomatic ground there to either Saudi Arabia or Iran, or also Russia, which is heavily implicated.

Yet while Turkey is an important player in the region, that neither Saudi Arabia nor Iran can risk alienating, still the close relations between Russia and Iran may well lead Turkey to tilt in favor of Saudi Arabia. Turkey has economic relations with both countries, but those with Saudi Arabia have a better horizon for more significant development, including the prospect of important military sales contracts.

It is a cruel puzzle. What is required to guarantee peace is economic co-operation and prosperity, but only peace can bring economic co-operation and prosperity. But the development of markets and human resources does not take place in the short term. Turkey risks being overwhelmed by the war and instability in its neighborhood. It does not have the diplomatic, economic, or human resources to impose peace.

Israel might sell gas to Turkey but would be unlikely to rely on Turkey for gas transit to Europe. Turkey's "ship of state" is being tossed on the seas of social, political, and religious upheaval. This is why Turkey reaches out to Israel as a buoy of stability.

Israel could indeed be such a point of reference for all these countries. It is so for Egypt, and increasingly so for Saudi Arabia. Iran's state ideology and its consistent wish to revise the map of region against the interests of its neighbors are the greatest stumbling-block to peace and stability.

Forget Swift Boats; this election year could become the battle of the armadas. Thanks to the success of misleading ads against John Kerry in 2004—as well as recent Supreme Court and Federal Election Commission actions—the current presidential contest promises to be more cacophonous and mud strewn than any in recent history, with a record number of down-and-dirty ads financed on the sly by big-money interests. Attacks bankrolled by "independent" groups—businesses, unions, and millionaires—and amplified by YouTube and reporters starved for news "will play a much greater role than ever before," predicts a top gop strategist.

There's just one catch: Groups that make it their express aim to influence federal elections—campaign and party committees, for example—are limited to $5,000 contributions from individuals and can't take money from corporations or unions. But recruiting enough $5,000 donors to underwrite a multimillion-dollar ad buy is a chore. So for those hoping to destroy a candidate with a clever spot or a cheap shot, the key question is which campaign-finance loophole to use.

In 2004, the answer was 527 committees, named after the tax-code provision covering them. These groups can take unlimited donations. Billionaire George Soros alone gave nearly $24 million to 527s that year, including America Coming Together and the Media Fund, which together netted about $140 million in support of John Kerry. On the gop side, the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth and the Progress for America Voter Fund raised about $58 million, of which T. Boone Pickens pitched in $4.5 million.

The Federal Election Commission recently ruled that these four 527s had violated campaign-finance law—that they essentially were campaign groups in disguise and should have abided by the $5,000 limit. Yet for what amounted to nearly $200 million in illegal spending, the groups were fined, in total, only $2.4 million, three years after the fact—a punishment easy to dismiss as "the cost of doing business," in the words of Fred Wertheimer, president of the clean-campaign advocacy group Democracy 21.

Debate's Final Moment — Transformative?

Nevertheless, the fec action has made some donors think twice about 527s, says Wertheimer—which is why political operatives are busy cooking up other stratagems. One involves funneling money to nonprofit advocacy groups like MoveOn and the nra, known as 501(c)(4)s after another tax provision, for voter organization efforts and election-related ads. (Donations to these organizations, unlike those to educational and charitable nonprofits known as 501(c)(3)s, aren't tax deductible; many groups, such as the Sierra Club, have both a (c)(3) and a (c)(4) arm.) Under the 2002 McCain-Feingold act, these advocacy groups were banned from running "issue ads" directed at candidates within two months of a general election. But the Supreme Court modified that ban last June. Now a nonprofit could, say, run a spot just before election time noting that Candidate X once voted against building a wall on the Mexico border, warning that—cue the ominous music!—X is willing to let terrorists sneak into the United States, and exhorting viewers to call X to register their outrage. So long as the ad hasn't (officially) been coordinated with X's opponent and doesn't outright say "vote against X," it's fine. And here's the best part: There are no limitations on the size of a contribution to a (c)(4), nor do its donors have to be disclosed. Moreover, due to that same Supreme Court decision, unions and corporations can now directly finance their own issue ads, expanding the number of players who can slam—or slime—the candidates in 2008.

Wertheimer identifies a few outfits likely to emerge as major independent spenders this year. On the gop side, a likely big player is Freedom's Watch, a (c)(4) founded last summer. In 2007 the group—whose top donor has been casino mogul Sheldon Adelson—spent at least $15 million to support the surge in Iraq, and according to spokesman Jake Suski, it plans to expand its operations in 2008. (See "Betting on Red" in our last issue or at MotherJones.com.) In the Democratic camp, strategists including Clinton White House chief of staff John Podesta and Service Employees International Union (seiu) official Anna Burger have launched a 527 named the Fund for America to raise money and distribute it to (c)(4)s doing voter organization in 10 to 12 key states; a parallel entity headed by Tom Matzzie, the former head of MoveOn's Washington office, will produce issue ads aimed at undercutting the Republican nominee. The Fund for America is hoping to raise at least $100 million.

The legality of this circuitous strategy, admits one Fund for America official, is not fully tested: "We've built into the budget a little money in the expectation that we're unintentionally going to go beyond the boundaries of the law. We know we'll get challenged and will have people watching us every step of the way." The good news for the independent spenders is that a congressional tussle over the appointment of commissioners left the fec with four of its six seats vacant at the start of the year, effectively shutting it down. "If you believe there's no sheriff in town," Wertheimer says ruefully, "anything goes."

Sure enough, the primary season has already seen some sneaky independent action. Prior to January's Iowa caucuses, a (c)(4) called Common Sense Issues set up the website TrustHuckabee.com to recruit pro-Huckabee precinct captains—a blatant and probably prohibited scheme to create a parallel campaign infrastructure. ("They are looking at a lot of litigation," says a former fec official who asked not to be identified. "This is way beyond anything anybody should try.") And a 527 named Alliance for a New America, financed in part by seiu affiliates, ran issue ads in Iowa hailing John Edwards' anti-lobbyist proposals. The Alliance received $495,000 from Rachel "Bunny" Mellon, the 97-year-old daughter-in-law of industrialist Andrew Mellon. A lawyer holding power of attorney for Mellon is an Edwards supporter, and he refused to explain how the generous contribution had come about.

Clearly, political operators weren't very fearful of the fec or irs. The recent rule changes, though, could make Swift-Boat-style character assassination tougher this year. If a 527 or (c)(4) group funded by unlimited contributions produces ads attacking a candidate's past or fitness for office, it will be difficult for the group to claim them as issue ads. "I suppose a group can say, 'We'll file as a 527 not for the purpose of influencing the election, but to educate the public on the quality of the candidates,'" says Jan Baran, a veteran Republican campaign-finance lawyer. "But that would be skating on thin ice."

Which leaves the diy option: There are no restrictions on how much an individual can spend to influence an election, as long as she or he doesn't coordinate efforts with a candidate or party. Though most big-money people prefer a degree or two of separation from bare-knuckle politics, this year's high stakes could nudge some in that direction. "There is the possibility a billionaire will spend $100 million on the presidential campaign 'just because I feel like it,'" says Democratic consultant Guy Molyneux. "There's the potential for a huge ratcheting up. And we will see some pretty tough stuff." After all, the lesson of 2004 was that it only takes one good ad campaign to undo a candidate.

"We're looking at an enormous shift in control from parties and candidates to outside groups," says the former fec official. "For a candidate, this can mean a loss of control of your message. And this also covers congressional candidates. Imagine if three weeks before the election, someone dumps $600,000 into your House race and you have no idea who it is." Candidates, he adds, "should be scared. Very scared." Maybe voters, too.

Remarks at Organizing Event
January 20, 2016

HILLARY CLINTON: Thank you. Wow, thanks so much. (Cheers.) Thank you all. Hello, Burlington. Thank you all very much. Thank you. Wow. It's great being back here, and thank you all for coming out tonight and being part of this amazing process. I'm really grateful to you.

And before I get started with my remarks about what I think is at stake in this election and what I think you should be considering as you make up your mind once and for all and go out and caucus on February 1st, I just want to say thank you. You know, coming here as I did again, starting last April, I've had the opportunity to talk with and listen by now to thousands of Iowans, and you have impressed upon me all of your concerns, your hopes, some of your worries, some of the challenges that you and your families, your businesses, your schools, your communities, are facing; but also this sense of positive possibility about what we can do if we start working together again.

You've certainly informed me, made me a better candidate, given me a lot more to think about than I even had before I started. And I believe, thanks to you, I will be a better president, someone who really understands firsthand from you what we need to do in our country. So I wanted to start by saying thank you. (Applause.) Thank you for all you have meant to me.

Now, I know that there are a lot of you that have already made up your minds, and I thank you for that. I want to thank Zach, who came out and introduced me. He's one of my active, enthusiastic young volunteers. (Applause.) And I want to thank all the precinct captains who are here. Will everybody who's already a precinct captain or a precinct team member, just know – raise your hand – I want to thank you all so much for being part of this. (Cheers.) It's great. And I know that you have already, many of you, had a chance to meet with our two organizers, Adine (ph), who Zach mentioned, and Sarah. They have been working so hard, and I want you to do whatever they ask you to do in the next days leading up to the caucus.

I'm thrilled that I have this opportunity to talk with you tonight, and I would love to, if we have time, to take some questions. But I want to start by stating the obvious. The stakes in this election are so high. You know, every election is important, but you're going to be the first people world who get to decide who the Democratic nominee for president should be. And there are a lot of folks in our own country and in many others who are watching closely because it matters, not just to us, but it matters to the world who walks into that White House on January 20, 2017. And so it's now time for Iowans to really consider carefully who is prepared, ready, able, to do the job that waits.

Now, some of it we already know is going to have to be tackled, or at least I will tackle it – to get the economy going and growing; to provide more jobs with good incomes for more people in America. (Applause.) I will be prepared also for what might face us starting then around the world because we have to continue to try to make the world a more peaceful, secure, prosperous place.

So you have to decide who can do the job because it really is selecting both a president and a Commander in Chief. Those are equally important. They have different parts of this very overwhelming, in some ways, job that we ask one person to do. But that's why we spend our time meeting with you, answering your questions, to try to give you a feel for who would be the best person at this moment to lead our country.

I come to this campaign, and I would come to the presidency, with a lifetime of service, experience, and a vision about where our country should be in the 21st century. I feel passionately about this because I know how blessed I am, that I was born in this country to wonderful parents who gave me a great start in life. I went to wonderful public schools with teachers that inspired me to this day. I had the opportunity to go to college, which my mother never had. And then I chose to go to law school, and paid my way through because my father couldn't afford that.

So I feel like an extraordinarily lucky person. But I also know that everything I took advantage of – all the hard work of my dad, who was a small businessman; all the sacrifice of so many in his generation – he was in the Navy during World War II; the hard life my mom had but the loving home she created – I know that you cannot take anything for granted. Everybody has to always keep trying to make it better for those who come after. And that's why, when I left law school, I went to work for the Children's Defense Fund, as you saw in the video, because I knew there were a lot of kids in every part of our country who didn't have anywhere near the blessings and opportunities that I did.

So I bring a perspective to this campaign, and I would bring it to the White House, that motivates me to know I have to do everything possible to make progress for people in our country who deserve a president who is on your side, who fights for you, fights for your family, fights for the best in our nation. (Applause.) And I bring a record of having done that. You saw some of it again in the video.

I know what it's like to be knocked down but not knocked out. I've had a few hard times. I don't know anybody in this audience who hasn't had their own share. But I've learned, and I give my mom the credit for this, that it's not whether you get knocked down, it's whether you get back up. And I've gotten back up time and time and time again – (applause) – because I believe that we all have an opportunity to try to keep going and to help others along the way.

So when we didn't get the health care reform back in '93-'94, it would have been easy to quit, but I didn't. I said, look. We've got millions of kids who have no insurance. And you know, if kids don't get their health care early on in their lives, that can have lifelong consequences. You all know that. So we got the Children's Health Insurance Program, which now covers eight million kids. (Applause.) And we worked to reform the foster care and adoption system when I was First Lady because again, as an advocate for kids, I saw the terrible situation so many foster kids found themselves in. And I needed an ally in the Congress, and I went to one of the toughest, most partisan Republicans there was, Tom DeLay. And I said to him, "I know you care about foster kids. So do I. Will you work with me to try to improve their lives, to try to make it possible for more of them to get adopted, to have a permanent home?" He kind of paused. So, "Well, what do you want to do?" And I said, "Well, I want you to come to a meeting at the White House, and let's work together." I didn't call a press conference and say, oh, I've got Tom DeLay coming. I said, let's just start working together. Let's see what we can do to help these kids. Maybe it's the only thing – and it was – the only thing we'll ever work on together. But think of the difference we might make. And we did.

So we passed laws. The Safe Families and Adoption Act, which has increased the number of kids being adopted out of foster care, and provided more support for them. And that's what I mean when I say we've got to keep going. We've got to find common ground. You've got to help people be able to have what they need to make the most out of their own lives. You saw a little bit about what I did as Senator after 9/11. I can't even describe to you what that was like. Words really fail me, still today, all these years later. But to go to where we were attacked, the next day, and see what had been done to our country was devastating. But we had to get to work. We had to begin to get things put back together, including the lives of families who lost loved ones, nearly 3,000. Including the health of our first responders, our construction workers. I just met with a big group of ironworkers, and they were dropping their construction tools all over New York City to race to help try to save people because they knew how to move the heavy steel that was still standing.

So I worked to help them – (applause) – with the healthcare they needed against some pretty tough odds. But working on that –what was called "the pile" for weeks and months – first to try to save lives, to find bodies, then to clear it and rebuild it, took a toll on so many, and they deserved to be taken care of. So there's a lot that I have had the opportunity to experience, I would say even the privilege. And to work to solve the problems that the people I represented in New York – it's not all been a bed of roses. It's tough. The politics in our country, in case you haven't noticed, can be pretty harsh. I think I've been called nearly everything. (Laughter). I understand that. It's a competitive process. I wish it were not quite so mean-spirited. I don't think that reflects well on us, but we have to keep forging our way forward and trying to bring people back together again.

So here's really your decision now. You've been watching us cross Iowa, you've been watching us on TV, listening to us on radio, reading about us in the papers. And now you have to make a decision. Here's what I believe. I believe it's absolutely imperative for us to build on the progress we have made, not let it be ripped away (applause). I personally believe that President Obama doesn't get the credit he deserves for saving our economy – (applause) – from the terrible Great Recession he inherited. And Senator Sanders and I agree on a lot of goals. But we have differences. And it's that time in the campaign when he's making contrasts, and when I am as well.

One of our biggest differences is about healthcare. I remember what it was like when I was trying to get us toward universal healthcare. It was really tough. Insurance companies and the drug companies went right after me, spent tens of millions of dollars to try to convince folks that we shouldn't have universal healthcare. So when President Obama became President, he and I had – we contested each other on healthcare all during our long primary fight. I knew he was determined to try to do what needed to be done, and he got it done. When he started, we had – (applause) – we had 44 million people without insurance. The insurance companies called all the shots. They could basically stop you from getting insurance if you had a pre-existing condition.

When I was working on it back in the 90s, I remember going to the Children's Hospital in Cleveland, meeting with a group of parents who could not get insurance for their sick children at any price. And I will never forget a father of two little girls, both of whom had cystic fibrosis, just with tears in his eyes, saying, I have to have help so that I can take care of my girls. I said, well, what do they tell you when you go and you ask for some kind of insurance policy to help you do this? And he looked down, and looked up at me, and he said something I will never forget. He said, well, one of the insurance brokers just looked at me and he said, we don't insure burning houses. He said, they called my little girls burning houses. That's what was going on in our country, and I bet a lot of you could tell a story or two about it, right?

So we had 44 million people without insurance in 2009. The insurance companies could deny you care based on a pre-existing condition. They actually charged us women more for our health insurance than they charged men, so we were paying more. If you were a young person, you weren't insured, because you were probably still in school, or you were at a job not making much money. So it was a very difficult experience for many millions of Americans. President got to work. The Democratic Congress – because thankfully, when the President was elected, we not only had a Democratic President, we had a Democratic Senate, we had Democratic House. They passed the Affordable Care Act – (applause) – and look at the results. We've got nearly 19 million people now insured. Over 90% of Americans are insured. We are no longer at the mercy of the insurance companies. (Applause.)

You can stay on your parents' policy until you're 26, and I've heard a lot of folks in Iowa thanking the President for that. And that's something I want to protect and defend. The Republicans keep trying to repeal it. They voted to repeal it last week. They sent that to the White House. Thank goodness the President vetoed it. (Applause.) But I can guarantee you if they win the White House back, they will repeal it the very first week because they have promised their hardcore, right wing that they will do that.

Now Senator Sanders cares deeply about covering people. That certainly is a goal we share, but he wants to start all over again. He had a plan for about 20 years that I began asking questions about because I do know a little bit about healthcare and about how it works and how we have to protect people and make sure they get what they need. And in all those 20 years, he never got a sponsor in the Senate or got a vote in the House. And then right before the last debate, he changed his plan and put out an eight-page summary of his new plan, which is a single-payer plan, which will require total new legislation starting from scratch. I do not think we should start from scratch, my friends. I think we can build on what we have achieved, make it better and – (applause).

I don't want to plunge our nation back into a contentious, divisive debate. I sure don't want to give any room to the Republicans to repeal it. I want to fix it; I want to improve it; and I've got specific plans to do that. I want us to get the cost down. I want us to help people with their out-of-pocket costs. I want us to cap prescription drug costs. (Applause.) I want us to require that the drug companies have to negotiate with Medicare so that Medicare recipients get the benefit of lower negotiated drug prices. (Applause.) So that's a difference. I'm laying out specific plans about how I will improve it while I protect and defend it.

I want families in Iowa to start making progress right away. I don't want us debating healthcare all over again. I want to be pushing for the economic and tax changes that I favor in order to make the wealthy pay their fair share and to create more jobs and raise income. That is my highest priority. (Applause.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So let's not fight about healthcare; let's keep improving it. We can get to universal coverage. I mean I remember enough of the arithmetic I learned. It's a lot easier to get from 90 percent of coverage to a 100 percent than starting over and going from zero to 100. So let's close the gap; let's decrease the cost; let's go after the drug companies; get those prescription drug costs down; and improve the way that we deliver services. (Applause.) I had a doctor at one of my events ask me the other day, he said, "Well, where do you stand on doctors?" And I said, "I love them. They've done great work for me and my family." He said, "Well, do you support doctors?" I said, "Oh, yes, I do support doctors." The Republicans support the drug companies and the insurance companies. I don't want either of them at my bedside if I'm ever sick. I support the doctors, the nurses, the pharmacists, the people who are actually delivering healthcare services to us. (Applause.)

Now when it comes to the economy – and that's one of the big differences we've had in this very spirited debate – here's what I think. I think we have to make the wealthy pay their fair share, and I have laid out specific plans to do that. Here are some of them. I agree with Warren Buffet. He has something he calls "The Buffet Rule." If you're a millionaire, you should pay at least a 30 percent effective tax rate because you have done really well in our country and you have taken advantage of everything that prior generations built up and created, and you should not avoid your obligation to supporting our country, our society, our future. (Applause.) But I want to go further. I have proposed what I call a Fair Share Surcharge, because here's what I'm worried about. I'm worried about all these gimmicks that the wealthy use to shelter their income, send it to places like Bermuda, call it something that it isn't. So the only way we can end that is to propose a surcharge of 4 percent on every form of their income so they can't hide it; they can't put it in a tax shelter; they have to pay on all of it. That will raise about $150 billion if you impose it on people making more than $5 million. (Applause.)

Now I also believe that we should incentivize profit sharing because if you help a company make profits, you should share in those profits, not just the executives but every one of you who has contributed to that. And it will make us a stronger economy, and it will make a more loyal workforce. Because if you think you're going to actually get to take advantage of your hard work at the end of the year, you're likely to stay; you're likely to make a real commitment.

Of course, I want to raise the minimum wage and I want to give as much of a raise as I think we can possibly get, and then I want to index it to inflation so it keeps going up so we don't have to keep voting on it and try to get the Congress to approve it, but that it keeps going up at appropriate stages so that people are not left behind. (Applause.)

I was at a small event last week and a woman came up to me here and said, "I'm working three jobs, I can barely make ends meet." They were all three minimum wage jobs. It is not right if you work full time that you're still in poverty – (applause) – and we have to begin to increase the wages of people who are working. I want people to work. That's the best answer to any kind of social issue. And then I pledge to you I will do everything I can – you saw when I went to Beijing and spoke out about women's rights and human rights. (Applause.) So I want women to earn equal pay for the work they do. It helps families; it helps our economy; it gives people a better shot.

And so what about Wall Street. You hear a lot about Wall Street in this election. Well, I'll tell you, I'm the one who went to Wall Street before the crash and said, "You all are making a huge mistake doing what you're doing." I made it clear that we had to change CEO bonuses. I called to end loopholes particularly for hedge fund managers. I'm on record of having not just talked about it but tried to do something about it. And I intend to do everything I can as [resident to make sure that Wall Street never wrecks Main Street again. (Applause.)

And one of the big distinctions between us and my two esteemed opponents, the Governor and the Senator, is that they both have the same answer to what we need to do, basically reinstate Glass-Steagall and break up the big banks. We have the authority to break up the big banks right now in Dodd-Frank. Dodd-Frank gives the government the rights and lays out the process for doing that if these banks are causing what is called a systemic risk to our financial system. It will take grit and guts to do it if that is what is called for, but we have the authority. It was passed. The President signed it into law. What we don't have is what I am advocating for. And this is one of those differences. And it is kind of like we are in a vigorous agreement but we are not exactly seeing eye to eye because I have said no bank is too big to fail and no executive is too powerful to jail. And I will do that if that is what is called for. (Applause.)

However, if you go back and look at what happened in 2008, it wasn't primarily the big banks that caused it. It was the investment banks, like Lehman Brothers. It was other banks, like Wachovia. It was mortgage companies, like Countrywide. It was a giant insurance company called AIG. They would not be affected at all by what my opponents are proposing.

So what I am trying to do is use the law we passed, protect it against the Republicans from trying to rip it apart, which is what they are doing, but go further, put into law provisions that will enable us to go after the investment banks or the so-called shadow banking system. That is where the experts say the next potential problem could come from. (Applause.) And we don't have enough tools to regulate them.

And the plan that I have put forth has been analyzed. And people like Barney Frank, who knows a lot about this – he is the Frank of Dodd-Frank – and Paul Krugman, the Nobel Prize-winning progressive economist from The New York Times, has looked at all of our plans and have said I have a tougher, more effective, more comprehensive plan. (Applause.)

So if your main issue is what are we going to do to stop Wall Street and the big banks and the shadow banks and all of these other institutions that are out there from hurting us again, I am the person for you because I understand – (Applause.) (Cheers.) – how tough it will be, but I know how to do it.

And I will give you the best evidence I could. Ask yourselves, if the Wall Street guys and the big finance guys were so sure that I wouldn't do what I tell you I will do, why are they running ads against me? (Applause.) Why is Karl Rove taking money from the financial interests and running ads against me to try to influence Democrats in Iowa not to caucus for me? Why are two hedge fund billionaires running ads against me? I will tell you why: because they know that I will come right after them and that I know how to get it done. (Applause.) (Cheers.)

And then, finally, let me just say a word about foreign affairs and national security because, like I said in the beginning, I can't stand here today and tell you everything the next President and commander-in-chief is going to be confronting. I don't think President Obama or any President knows what is going to happen over four or eight years. So you have got to be prepared. You have got to be constantly thinking about contingencies and what will you do if X or Y or Z happens. But we know one threat we have to face right now, and that is from ISIS. And I am the only candidate on either side who has laid out a specific plan about what I would do to defeat ISIS.

And, very briefly, because I have given speeches, one of you tonight told me that you switched from my opponent to me because you looked at my speech – (Applause.) – that I gave about the Iran nuclear agreement that I helped to negotiate by putting the sanctions on Iran that got us to the negotiating table. And I give John Kerry and President Obama all of the credit they deserve – (Applause.) – for bringing that home and making our world safer.

So I want you to know where I stand and what I would do. And here is what I would do, quickly, about ISIS. I agree that we have to lead an air coalition to deprive them of territory, to go after their infrastructure and their leadership, and support the fighters on the ground, the Arab and Kurdish fighters, in the Iraqi army, and Arab militias in Iraq and Feshmerga. That is the Kurdish militias, who are really in the day-to-day combat with ISIS. But I will not send American ground troops to – (applause) – Syria or Iraq to fight ISIS or (inaudible) or any other reason. I think that would be a mistake, and I will never let that happen. I support having Special Forces there to work with these fighters on the ground – (Applause.) – to help call in air strikes to be in a position to be able to help supervise and mentor, and I support those of our military or help who are helping the Iraqi army get its act together again after the army that we helped to build and train was destroyed by Maliki.

So I will continue and intensify what we are doing. I will also go after their foreign funds and foreign fighters and their propaganda online because we are facing a new phenomenon. (Applause.) This terrorist network has a global reach. And it is inspiring people, radicalizing people, celebrating violence, directing attacks. So we have to take them on where they are doing that, and that is online. And I talked to some of the biggest companies in Silicon Valley. I have talked with people in our government. We have got to figure out how we don't let them take advantage of the wonder of the internet to promote their evil ideology.

And here at home, I would do whatever it takes to keep us safe. That experience of mine from 9/11 is seared into my brain. And I will not only do everything I can to coordinate federal, state, and local law enforcement but to get more information from friends overseas so that we are acting in real time.

But I'll tell you one thing that I think is very important, and I've gone all over the country saying this. When you hear from the Republicans, particularly their leading candidate, the kind of anti-Muslim rhetoric and the offensive, shameful comments that they are putting out in the world that are being heard by billions of people, that's not only wrong, it's dangerous. (Applause.) We need to be working with American Muslims. We need to be working with Muslim nations to defeat the scourge of terrorism. And I don't know if you saw the papers, but the British parliament launched a debate about whether to legally bar Donald Trump from coming into their country. (Applause.) Well, it might make it harder for him to travel, but it also sent a message, didn't it? About what our closest allies think about all this.

One of the things that I learned after the '08 campaign, after President Obama asked me to be Secretary of State, is how closely people around the world follow our election. I don't think I really understood that. I assumed that there'd be people sitting in government offices or maybe in business board rooms following it, but no, it is followed closely by literally billions of people. The first trip I took as Secretary of State, I went to Asia, and I went to Indonesia and I was on a morning talk show – they call it "The Awesome Show." There's a lot of singing and dancing, which I didn't know until I got there, and it really made me nervous. You do not want to see me – well, I danced, but you don't want to hear me sing. (Laughter.) And so I was appearing, because we understood what we inherited from the Bush administration required us to build back good feeling toward the United States, because it had been sorely reduce in the eight years of the George W. Bush administration.

So we were doing things like going on popular shows to communicate directly with people, not just to leaders. And the first question I was asked was this: "We followed your election. We saw how hard you and President Obama ran against each other. And then he asked you to be Secretary of State. How does that work?" And I realized in these new democracies, I mean, you run against somebody, you speak out against somebody, you can get exiled or imprisoned, not asked to be Secretary of State. So it was a very legitimate question. And I thought – I had, like, a nanosecond to think, and I said, "Well, you're right, we ran hard against each other in our electoral process. That's what we do. He won, I lost, and then I went to work to help get him elected, and I was very happy he did. And then he called me literally out of the blue, asked me to be Secretary of State. He asked me, and I agreed for the same reason: we both love our country. We are both committed to serving our country. That's all (inaudible)." (Applause.) It matters. It matters what you say as a president. It matters what you do as a president.

So I'm asking for your help. I'm very proud to have been endorsed by a wonderful group of individuals and institutions, in part because they know me. So when Gabby Giffords and her wonderful husband, the astronaut Mark Kelly, endorsed me because I'm standing up to the gun lobby, that means the world to me. (Applause.) And that so many unions endorsed me, I cannot tell you how proud it makes me. Because the American labor movement built the American middle class, and I want it to be once again supported and given the kind of opportunity to raise the standard of living – (applause) – whether you're a police officer or a fire fighter or an iron worker, a teacher, a public employee, whatever you are. You're really building America.

And I was proud to be endorsed by the Planned Parenthood Action Fund because of the work I've done for so many years to defend women's health. (Applause.) And I was proud to be supported and endorsed by the Human Rights Campaign because of the work I've done to end discrimination against the LGBT community. (Applause.) And I've got to tell you, I was somewhat confused when Senator Sanders said, well, Planned Parenthood and Human Rights Campaign, they're part of the establishment and that's why they're supporting Hillary Clinton, because it's all part of the establishment. I thought, boy, I wish it were. I wish we weren't fighting all the time to protect women's rights, to protect women's health. If it were part of the establishment, that would be time for all of us to just quit having to work so hard and defend it and fight for it. Well, that's just not the case. We have to keep working to make sure people are not taken advantage of, not stripped of their rights. (Applause.)

And the Republicans want to do all of that. So I'm asking you for your support on February 1st, to come and caucus for me, to be part of starting a campaign that will not only go through the primaries, but I'll be back often to win your votes in the general election. I do not want to see Iowa go any direction other than blue, Democratic, building the future, making a difference for all of us. (Applause.)

And as I said, it really is a great honor for me to have spent these months meeting with so many people in cafes and backyards and workplaces and community colleges and universities and so many different settings – labor halls, churches – we've been all over Iowa. And it's been incredibly important to me because it's helped to shape my campaign. And I want to end on this: When I started running for president, I didn't think that some of the issues I've been talking about would be part of my presidential campaign. I knew the economy would be what I wanted to do. I knew health care would be. I knew foreign policy/national security would be. I knew education would be, and a lot of the contentious issues that we have to fight the Republicans over would be. But I didn't realize how important it would be – and it started on my very first day in Davenport – to talk about mental health. To talk about substance abuse. (Applause.) And you hear the stories of families that are dealing with Alzheimer's and autism. And to understand how important it is we keep investing in medical research and that we change the way we treat addiction, treat it more like the disease it is instead of the criminal offense it's been labeled as. (Applause.) And how important it is that we make good on our promise to give people with mental health problems the health care they need too. (Applause.)

And I believe so strongly that we need a president who can do all parts of the job. We need a president who can get the economy working for everybody and get incomes rising. We need a president who can keep us safe and keep us strong in the world. And we need a president who will get up every day trying to figure out how to help you deal with the problems that keep you up at night.

I want a strong, confident, united America. That's what I'm asking you to support. Thank you all very much. (Applause.) Thank you. Thank you, thank you, thank. Let me shake hands.

Glaciers melting at alarming rate! Huge uptick in meteor fireballs! Sharp rise in tornadoes, quakes, volcanic eruptions, sinkholes, landslides, melting permafrost, ocean warming.

IS A NEAR-TERM WORLDWIDE CATACLYSM AHEAD ???

(Minds are like parachutes. They only function when they are open!!)

A gigantic hierarchical website of transcribed communications to an American woman, over more than 15 years to date, from benevolent extra-terrestrials, claims that Planet X (or historical Nibiru), four times larger in diameter than Earth and magnetically more than 20 times stronger, is on a long elliptical path now slowly passing between the Sun and Earth --- and does so every 3600+ years. The existence of Nibiru and its long orbit was first revealed by the Jewish-American scholar Zecharia Sitchin in his 1976 book “The 12th Planet” and multiple follow-on authored books all based on his Middle-Eastern archeological hieroglyphic interpretations. Nibiru was first spotted remotely by USA astronomers in 1983 and reported at that time in the Washington Post --- but since has been subject to a governmental coverup.

It is currently hidden in the Sun's glare, but distant photo images have been provided on the website and the internet. As it passes closer to Earth with its long tail of moons and asteroids, likely within the next 24-or-so months, the aliens’ website predicts it will cause a drastic Earth pole shift of about ninety degrees, due to its magnetic strength. This would result per the website in more Earth wobble, then violent mega-earthquakes, super-hurricane winds, worldwide volcanic eruptions, and oceanic sloshing with gigantic tidal waves inundating most low-lying coastal areas and cities, e.g., Netherlands, Denmark, Bangladesh, Singapore, Hong Kong, NYC, LA, Miami. Food, water, electricity, and gasoline distribution would collapse resulting in massive relocations, rampant crime, riots and starvation. Much housing would be destroyed. Melting old poles combined with much warmer oceans due to a hotter Earth core, per the aliens, would cause a greater than 600 foot rise in ocean levels in the following two years. In worst case, as little as ten or twenty percent of the world population might survive.

Exactly when this shift might happen is unclear if all goes as currently projected, but we already have an unusual number of signs. A rise in strong earthquakes, e.g., Chile, New Zealand, Sumatra, northern Japan, Turkey. Increasing volcanic activity occurring worldwide. Alarming glacier melting. Unprecedented land sinking, e.g., Java, Indonesia, Malaysia, Thailand, Vietnam, Cambodia. Malfunctioning electronic connections for satellites. Bridge and mine collapses. Worldwide RR derailments. Water, sewer and gas line breaks. And much unusual weather: Intractable droughts, with massive crop damage. Unprecedented regional downpours and flooding major regions, e.g., Java, Philippines. Much flooding in unusual spots. Giant sinkholes, e.g., China, Pennsylvania, Florida. Unusual rogue tidal waves. A sharp rise in USA tornadoes. Melting pole ice and glaciers. Recently, huge asteroid hit, e.g., in Russia.

Minor wobbles of the Earth pole positions are occurring per the website. Nibiru's magnetic strength apparently is already stirring the earth environment and appears to be causing some of the climate change/global warming effects, questionably blamed on atmospheric CO2. Leading up to the shift, near-term, they predict more Japanese mega-quakes, a build-up of Midwest USA quakes from Memphis/New Madrid to Buffalo NY, then an early tsunami inundating low portions of the Netherlands, Denmark, and UK.

TAKING STEPS AHEAD OF TIME WOULD BE CRITICAL AS THE SHIFT WOULD TAKE PLACE WITH LIMITED WARNING. This is likely to happen before 2016 or 2017. Many early indicators are occurring as cited above, but mainly, a second (small blob-like) sun will next become visible in daylight by eyesight --- but apparently already visible with multiple moons and trailing dust/rock clouds per select photos (re Nibiru) in the website. There would, according to the alien predictions, be a lean of the North pole leading to three days of darkness for the northern hemisphere. The Internet would begin to malfunction as satellites, oceanic cables fail, as already occurring in the western Pacific. Within four months after the lean, the pole shift would then occur rather suddenly. If this does happen, to survive, food, water, and gasoline especially must be accumulated and stored. And camping equipment with gardening and other tools. Moving far away beforehand, i.e., at least 200 miles and 1000 ft elevation, from low coastal areas would be critical for survival.

Why hasn't Nibiru's existence been publicized? Because leaders in major governments know and have suppressed informing, wanting to avoid panic, hoping perhaps that results would be less than predicted. Severity of damages to Earth depend on where Earth is in its solar system orbit relative to the Nibiru passage. Only a select circle of world and USA leaders are informed and preparing. At some point, the various governments will be forced to openly announce its presence. Any first public announcement by USA/NASA leaders is likely to minimize projections in order to minimize reactionary panic.

All this may seem preposterous, but my extended research over the last dozen-plus years into pre-history, abandoned cities archeology, mythology, past geological catastrophes, such as many underwater civilization remnants, provide ample evidence for past pole shifts. Psychic messengers, Mother Mary apparition messages, UFO/alien communications, English crop circle designs, all are providing warnings specifically time-wise to a pole shift about this current period, based on a frequency pattern of every 3600+ years due to a periodic Nibiru flyby. No direct hit with Earth is anticipated.

For a few historical and geological examples:

1) Niagara Falls gorge was created about 3600 years ago per geologists, 2) Simultaneously, larger northern Canada lakes were created, 3) At that time, also an upward thrust of the Andes happened, 4) Greenland ice cores show volcanic ash layer about 1600+ BC, 5) Tree rings in Irish oak logs in peat bogs show growth stop about 1600+ BC, 6) California Bristlecone pine trees show no growth rings about 1600+ BC, 7) Thera/Santorini eruption occurred about 1600+ BC in Mediterranean, Minoan Crete culture inundated, 8) Shang Dynasty China suffered abrupt end about 1600+ BC due to severe events. 9)Alien messages from the Cassiopaean star system date the last shift specifically as the year 1588 BC--- plus 2014 = 3602 years, and 10) numerous other geological events e.g., about 11,000 years ago, or 3 times 3600 years, there is worldwide geological evidence of horrendous chaos about the time of the disappearance of Atlantis. Also, 4 times 3600 years is one estimate of the time period for inundation of a continent surrounding Easter Island.

NOW, in the spring of 2014, in spite of potential ridicule, I feel an obligation to alert everyone EARLY about the horrible possibilities to let you decide what if anything you will do to prepare. Look for related news, study, then ACT, or deny and ignore, as you see best for you and those you love. THE BIG IDEA:

OXFORD, Ala.—Donald Trump is the odds-on favorite to win tomorrow's Alabama Republican primary. But Super Tuesday also brings the first round of down-ballot congressional primaries in 2016, and what Trump has unleashed is giving heartburn to GOP incumbents who will be on the ballot with him.

Richard Shelby has been in Congress since the 1970s and faced no significant challenge since getting elected to the Senate in 1986. Yet the 81-year-old has spent millions of dollars in an effort to receive more than 50 percent of the vote tomorrow so that he can avoid a runoff with an unknown, 33-year-old challenger.

In a previously unreported development, the National Republican Senatorial Committee quietly deployed many staffers from its Washington headquarters to pull Shelby across the finish line. The senator is saturating the airwaves with commercials that portray him as one of the biggest thorns in President Obama's side and attacking his opponent – a retired Marine captain – as "a con man."

After Eric Cantor's surprise defeat in 2014, Shelby has left nothing to chance. But the continuing success of Trump's outsider message has given additional anxiety not just to his campaign but also to members like Kevin Brady, the House Ways and Means Committee chairman who is hustling to fend off his own primary challenge in Texas tomorrow.

"Our polls look good, but you never know," Shelby said in a brief interview before hopping into a BMW SUV after an event here. "There's frustration everywhere. That's why I go all out."

There's something very retro and almost old-fashioned about Shelby's pitch, which emphasizes his seniority: He opened his speech at the Calhoun County Republican Party's annual dinner by noting that he's seeking a sixth term. "You've kept me up there a while," he told 315 party activists as they ate shrimp and grits and sipped sweet tea Friday night. "It gives us opportunities to make a difference because of the power structure. You can't go to Washington as a congressman and a senator and expect to make a difference all at once. You have to earn your way."

Shelby told the crowd that he currently chairs the Banking Committee but opened up about his grander ambition. "If things go right, maybe I'll chair the Appropriations Committee. And I'll tell you: Calhoun County would know it! And Alabama would know it," Shelby added, drawing a standing ovation. "I'm about one step from that!" (The current Appropriations chairman is Mississippi's Thad Cochran, who got reelected in 2014.)

Shelby is an institution here in the Heart of Dixie. Half a dozen public buildings in Alabama are named for him. Structural thank yous for directing government largesse back home stand at the University of Alabama campuses in Tuscaloosa, Birmingham and Huntsville. There's also a Shelby Center at Auburn and a Shelby Hall at the University of South Alabama.

Shelby challenger Jonathan McConnell waits for an event to begin in Hoover, Ala. (AP Photo/Brynn Anderson)

“People are sick of his big spending ways,” said Jonathan McConnell, the senator’s principal challenger in the primary. “He’s great at building monuments to himself, but the cost of that is crushing future generations.”

McConnell, who owns a maritime security company that defends merchant ships off the coast of Somalia, argues that Shelby is “too old” and has been in Washington “too long.” Since Antonin Scalia’s death earlier this month, McConnell has been hitting Shelby for blocking Robert Bork’s nomination to the Supreme Court in 1987 (back when he was still a Democrat).

The challenger’s strategy is to very explicitly appeal to supporters of Trump and Ted Cruz. “That’s going to be up to 70 percent of the vote,” McConnell said in an interview. “I think that’s going to help a lot actually. People are frustrated with the status quo, and that’s why you’ve seen Trump’s success. I don’t think they’re going to cancel out their vote by voting for Richard Shelby.”

McConnell said he paid for an internal poll three weeks ago that showed he was within the margin of error of forcing a runoff. But he said it is hard to break through because the local press is “afraid” to write negative stories about Shelby and national outside groups stayed on the sidelines, deterred by the nearly $20 million war chest that the incumbent had amassed before the campaign began. “They’re timid after they got burned (taking) on Thad Cochran two years ago,” he said.

Remarkably, Shelby's message that he can bring home lots of bacon if he gets six more years in office seems to be resonating – at least with more than two dozen folks I interviewed. Several credited the senator with protecting the nearby Anniston Army Depot from closure.

"We're a poor state. Calhoun County is a poor county. We need what he offers," said Fred Hughes, 62, the treasurer of the county GOP and a Ben Carson supporter. "We get respect in Alabama because of him."

Eli Henderson, the circuit clerk for Calhoun County courts, is a strong Trump supporter who was very impressed by Shelby's speech. "Oh my God, if he gets that: Being chairman of the Appropriations Committee is probably the most important position in all of the Senate," Henderson said. "Whoever was hanging on not voting for him, you almost got to vote for him now because that is the money stream. That got me!"

"I'm favoring Trump because I like his ideas and I want to see thing shook up," said Greg Drummond, 59, who operates a gun range in Talladega. But he said the desire to shake things up doesn't extend to Shelby. He said he's "for him all the way" because his seniority argument "makes 100 percent sense."

Not too long ago, as earmarks were going the way of the dinosaurs because of tea party opposition, this embrace of pork-barrel spending would have been hard to fathom, especially in a conservative state like Alabama. Mitch McConnell, for instance, ran ads in 2008 touting earmarks and all the ways he'd delivered for Kentucky. By 2014, facing a credible primary challenge and a base suspicious of all federal spending, the GOP leader mostly avoided boasting about projects he'd made possible.

But in some ways, Shelby's messaging is not all that different from Trump's: he's a deal maker who will "win" again for Alabama. And he does not mind rubbing Senate colleagues like John McCain the wrong way.

"I think he's going to be alright, but the problem is there's so much anti-incumbent attitude amongst the electorate," James W. Bennett, the chairman of the Calhoun County Republican Party, said of Shelby's chances on Tuesday. "A lot of people aren't thinking. They're going to throw the baby out with the bath water just because they're so angry."

Bennett, who owns a lumber company, supports Marco Rubio in the presidential race, but he thinks Trump is likely to carry the state. "They're angry, they're lashing out, and they're easy to get motivated and revved up," he said of Trump's supporters. "It kind of reminds me of George Wallace. George Wallace was very populist, and it was just all about rhetoric. The anger should be directed at Obama, but a lot of people don't understand. They're very impatient, and they know they're hurting. They're out of jobs. They're disappointed about the direction this country is headed, the morals and everything else. There's going to be people turning out to vote who never have. And it is not part of any voter registration drive."

Longtime state Rep. Steve Hurst, an old friend of Shelby's, said "there's going to be some dent" in his share of the vote because of The Trump Effect, but he doesn't know how much. "It's only because new voters don't know him," said Hurst, who thinks Trump will be the GOP nominee. "The people want to hear something different than what they've heard."

Mike Rogers, who has represented this area in Congress since 2002, warmed up the crowd for Shelby at the county GOP dinner by saying he didn't fully appreciate how effective the senator was until he arrived in Washington. "Whether Republicans are in the majority or the minority, he is a 900-pound gorilla," Rogers said.

In an interview later, the congressman expressed surprise at how the presidential race has played out. "There's no telling what's going to happen," he said. "You never could have told me a year ago Donald Trump would be leading, even in New York. It's just bizarre. I served with Bernie. That boy is not right. My point is the world is upside down on both sides of the aisle, and I don't understand it."

"But Shelby is fine," he added. "You watch: he'll win by 10 to 12 points. He'll be in the 60s."

If Rogers is wrong, and Shelby winds up in a runoff, buckle up for a lot of suddenly competitive House and Senate GOP primaries over the next few

-- Speaking of Alabama, Jeff Sessions (the state's junior senator) endorsed Trump at his rally last night. It is a major blow to Cruz and his hopes for a comeback:

Sen. Jeff Sessions endorses Donald Trump

WHILE YOU WERE SLEEPING:

-- SIREN: A new CNN poll shows Trump's national lead growing. The businessman now tops his nearest competitor by more than 30 points: 49% back Trump, 16% Marco Rubio, 15% Ted Cruz, 10% Ben Carson and 6% John Kasich. The cable channel reports that he and Hillary Clinton are "poised to lead the nation's two major parties in this fall's presidential election." From pollster Jen Agiesta: "Trump's supporters are incredibly enthusiastic about the coming election, and largely committed in their support for him. Nearly 8 in 10 say that they are more enthusiastic about voting this year than in previous elections, among Republicans who are not supporting Trump, just 39% say they are more enthusiastic than in years past. Likewise, 78% of Trump's backers say they will definitely support him vs. 22% who say they could still change their minds. Among those backing other candidates, 57% say they are committed to their chosen candidate." And just a quarter of Republicans overall say they probably or definitely wouldn't support Trump in November. Clinton tops Sanders 55% to 38% in the new poll.

IT IS THE LATEST POLL SHOWING TRUMP AND CLINTON RUNNING AWAY WITH THEIR RACES:

-- Trump leads in Georgia and Tennessee by relatively large margins, according to NBC News/Wall Street Journal/Marist polls , while Cruz continues to best the GOP frontrunner in his home state of Texas (39-26). In Georgia, Trump gets 30 percent support, followed by Cruz and Rubio who are tied for 23 percent each. Trump again leads the field in Tennessee, enjoying a comfortable 18 percent lead on Cruz, 40 percent to 22 percent. Rubio falls just behind at 19 percent.

-- On the Democratic side, Clinton leads Sanders by about 2-1 in all three southern states: She's at 64 percent to his 30 percent in Georgia, and 60 percent to 34 percent in Tennessee. And in Texas, the former Secretary is up by 21 points, 59 percent to Bernie's 38 percent.

-- But the most telling numbers on the left come from Massachusetts, where Clinton now holds an eight-point lead over Sanders, according to a new Suffolk University poll . She's up 50-42, with a healthy amount of undecided voters still in the mix, but Sanders really needs to perform well here in order to continue as a viable candidate beyond Super Tuesday.

-- Sanders' campaign announced it has raised more than $36 million from 1.2 million individual contributions since the start of the month. Their goal is to get to $40 million by midnight.

Anna Fifield : “Escorted by North Korean guards, Warmbier, reading from hand-written notes, said that he had tried to steal a political sign promoting ‘the North Korean people’s love for their system’ from his hotel. … Warmbier was surely directed to deliver the bizarre statement, in which he praised North Korea’s ‘humanitarian treatment of severe criminals,’ and said he was ‘lured by the U.S. administration to commit a crime.’”

The production team and cast of "Spotlight" celebrate winniong the award for Best Picture on stage at the 88th Oscars in Hollywood. (AFP Photo/Mark Ralston)

-- "Spotlight," the drama about the Boston Globe's exposé of sex abuse in the Catholic Church, won best picture at the Academy Awards . The Globe has posted the stories that started it all here .

Post Film Critic Ann Hornaday's takeaway from the results : "Size and noise are fun, but restraint counts for something, too. … Loud, large-scale spectacles as 'The Revenant' and 'Mad Max: Fury Road' might have earned the most prizes, but the taut, restrained journalism drama 'Spotlight' wound up taking top honors for best picture, as well as best original screenplay. In a year in which nominees were exceptionally well balanced between populist box office extravaganzas and smaller, artier films, the awards ceremony itself followed a similar seesaw pattern. Whereas the hyperkinetic road picture 'Mad Max' swept the proceedings early, earning Oscars for sound, production design, editing and makeup and hair, it was soon joined by 'The Revenant' — an ambitious survival tale of a man crawling his way back to life and revenge after a bear attack. The year's most popular film, 'Star Wars: The Force Awakens,' was nominated for the usual slew of technical awards reserved for the special-effects spectacles that form the spine of Hollywood's business model (and lost them all)." See the complete list of winners here .

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

-- "Trump Mortgage Failed. Here's what that says about the GOP front-runner, " by Tom Hamburger and Michael Kranish: "As economists and Wall Street traders began to sense danger ahead of the crippling housing market collapse of 2008, Trump waved away worries and offered a concrete confidence in the industry, launching Trump Mortgage LLC in 2006. 'I think it's a great time to start a mortgage company,' he said. 'The real estate market is going to be very strong for a long time to come.' Within 18 months, Trump Mortgage was closed … As a presidential candidate a decade later, Trump says he'll use the skills that made him successful in real estate to fix Washington. But his decision to embrace the mortgage business illustrates the dangers of a business philosophy that relies in part on a willingness to put aside the advice of experts and take risks. 'I think the market is very good,' Trump said in 2006, when an anchor cited a 10-percent decline in home sales. 'It's Trump mortgage, it's going to be a fantastic company.'"

-- The Right to Rise autopsy you've been waiting for --> Strategist Mike Murphy says he only made "middle six figures" from the pro-Bush super PAC: After Bush suspended his presidential bid, many were left wondering what happened to the $100 million haul his super PAC had amassed – and how much of it was spent padding the pockets of longtime strategist Mike Murphy. Though Bush's ambitious endeavors certainly paid dividends for the GOP admaker over the years, Murphy told Matea Gold that his salary from Right to Rise was capped in the "middle six-figures." "Our operation was as tight as a tack," he said. Campaign finance reports show Right to Rise paid two Murphy firms $6.35 million for media, consulting and ad placement – less than 5 percent of the $81 million total spent on TV and digital ads. Overall, $94 million of the super PAC's $101 million went to political activities, with administrative and fundraising costs totaling about $7.6 million.

For his part, Bush does not second-guess the strategy of his super PAC or his longtime consultant. "Mike is a great talent and a loyal friend," Jeb told Matea in his first public comments since dropping out.

-- The Supreme Court will hear its most important abortion case in decades, and it could very likely come down to the vote of Anthony Kennedy. Robert Barnes : "Behind doors at an abortion clinic, workers await word from a man in Washington about whether Texas law will force its closure. In the Texas Capitol, officials hope Kennedy will consider an alternative narrative … The Supreme Court's landmark abortion case, being heard on Wednesday, is being pitched to an audience of one. While Kennedy is hardly the rescuer abortion rights supporters would wish for – he has upheld every abortion restriction save one – advocates recognize he is the 'only path to victory' following Scalia's death and assuming the court's four liberal judges will vote accordingly. If challengers convince Kennedy that the Texas law, which heightens standards for abortion providers and practices, is too onerous, it would have national implications: States passed more than 250 abortion restrictions in the past five years, and halved the number of Texas abortion facilities."

MORE ON THE REPUBLICAN RACE –

-- What dominated Sunday: Trump declined to disavow the Ku Klux Klan and other white supremacy groups on national television yesterday, saying he "needed to research the groups" before doing so. Trump's insistence that he "knows nothing" about white supremacy or former KKK Grand Wizard David Duke prompted a harsh torrent of criticism from across the political spectrum. (Jenna Johnson)

--Republican rivals piled on:

- "He knows exactly who Duke is," said Marco Rubio at a rally Purcellville, Va., adding that Trump would be "unelectable" if he refused to disavow Duke.
- Speaking to reporters in Oklahoma City, Ted Cruz called Trump's comments "really sad," adding: "In my view, racism and bigotry has no place in politics. That should be common ground among Republicans [and] Democrats ... among everyone."
- John Kasich weighed in from a town hall in Springfield, Mass. "That's horrific, right? We don't have any place for white supremacists in America. It doesn't make any sense. He really needs to make his position clear, and he ought to do it quickly."

--Finally last night, Trump tweeted a video of himself disavowing Duke at a Friday press conference. "As I stated at the press conference on Friday regarding David Duke — I disavow."

-- "The Republican Party's implosion over Trump's candidacy has arrived ," by Philip Rucker and Robert Costa: "The implosion over Trump's candidacy that Republicans had hoped to avoid arrived so virulently this weekend that many party leaders openly questioned whether the GOP could come together before the election … The fracas comes as the presidential race enters a potentially determinative month of balloting, beginning with primaries and caucuses in 11 states on Tuesday. At a moment when Republicans had hoped to begin taking on Hillary Clinton, the GOP has instead become consumed by a crisis over its identity and core values that is almost certain to last through the July party convention, if not the rest of the year. Republican officials had imagined uniting around a nominee with a broadly appealing message to begin prosecuting the case against Clinton. Instead, they are wondering anew whether mainstream voters could accept Trump as the nominee."

-- Sen. Ben Sasse (R-Neb.) said the Republican Party needs a "third option" should Trump win the primary nomination, formally calling for an independent conservative to challenge Trump from the right. (Paul Kane)

-- Senate Republicans are preparing to distance themselves from Trump in the general. The New York Times reported this weekend that Mitch McConnell has begun preparing senators for the prospect of a Trump nomination: “He has raised the possibility of treating Mr. Trump’s loss as a given and describing a Republican Senate to voters as a necessary check on a President Hillary Clinton … He has reminded colleagues of his own 1996 re-election campaign, when he won comfortably amid President Bill Clinton’s easy re-election. Of Mr. Trump, Mr. McConnell has said, ‘We’ll drop him like a hot rock,’ according to his colleagues."

-- Hobby Lobby founder David Green endorsed Rubio, saying that Florida Senator impressed him with his “preparation and humility.” “He gives the glory to God,” said Green. (Washington Examiner)

MORE ON THE DEMOCRATIC RACE

Battleground Texas – The Clinton campaign is focusing heavily on the Lone Star State ahead of Super Tuesday because they think winning big there will give her “a sheen of inevitability,” Abby Phillip reports from San Antonio : “African American and Latino surrogates have blanketed the state. Former president Bill Clinton has made frequent visits to Texas to support his wife, including a stop to kick off the state’s two-week early voting period in border towns including Laredo. And the candidate has locked down nearly universal support from state and local political leaders, which is a key advantage in Texas’s more rural communities. She has called upon loyalties dating back to the early 1970s, when young Bill Clinton and Hillary Rodham knocked on doors registering voters for the presidential campaign of Sen. George McGovern (S.D.) in poor, heavily Latino parts of the state…"

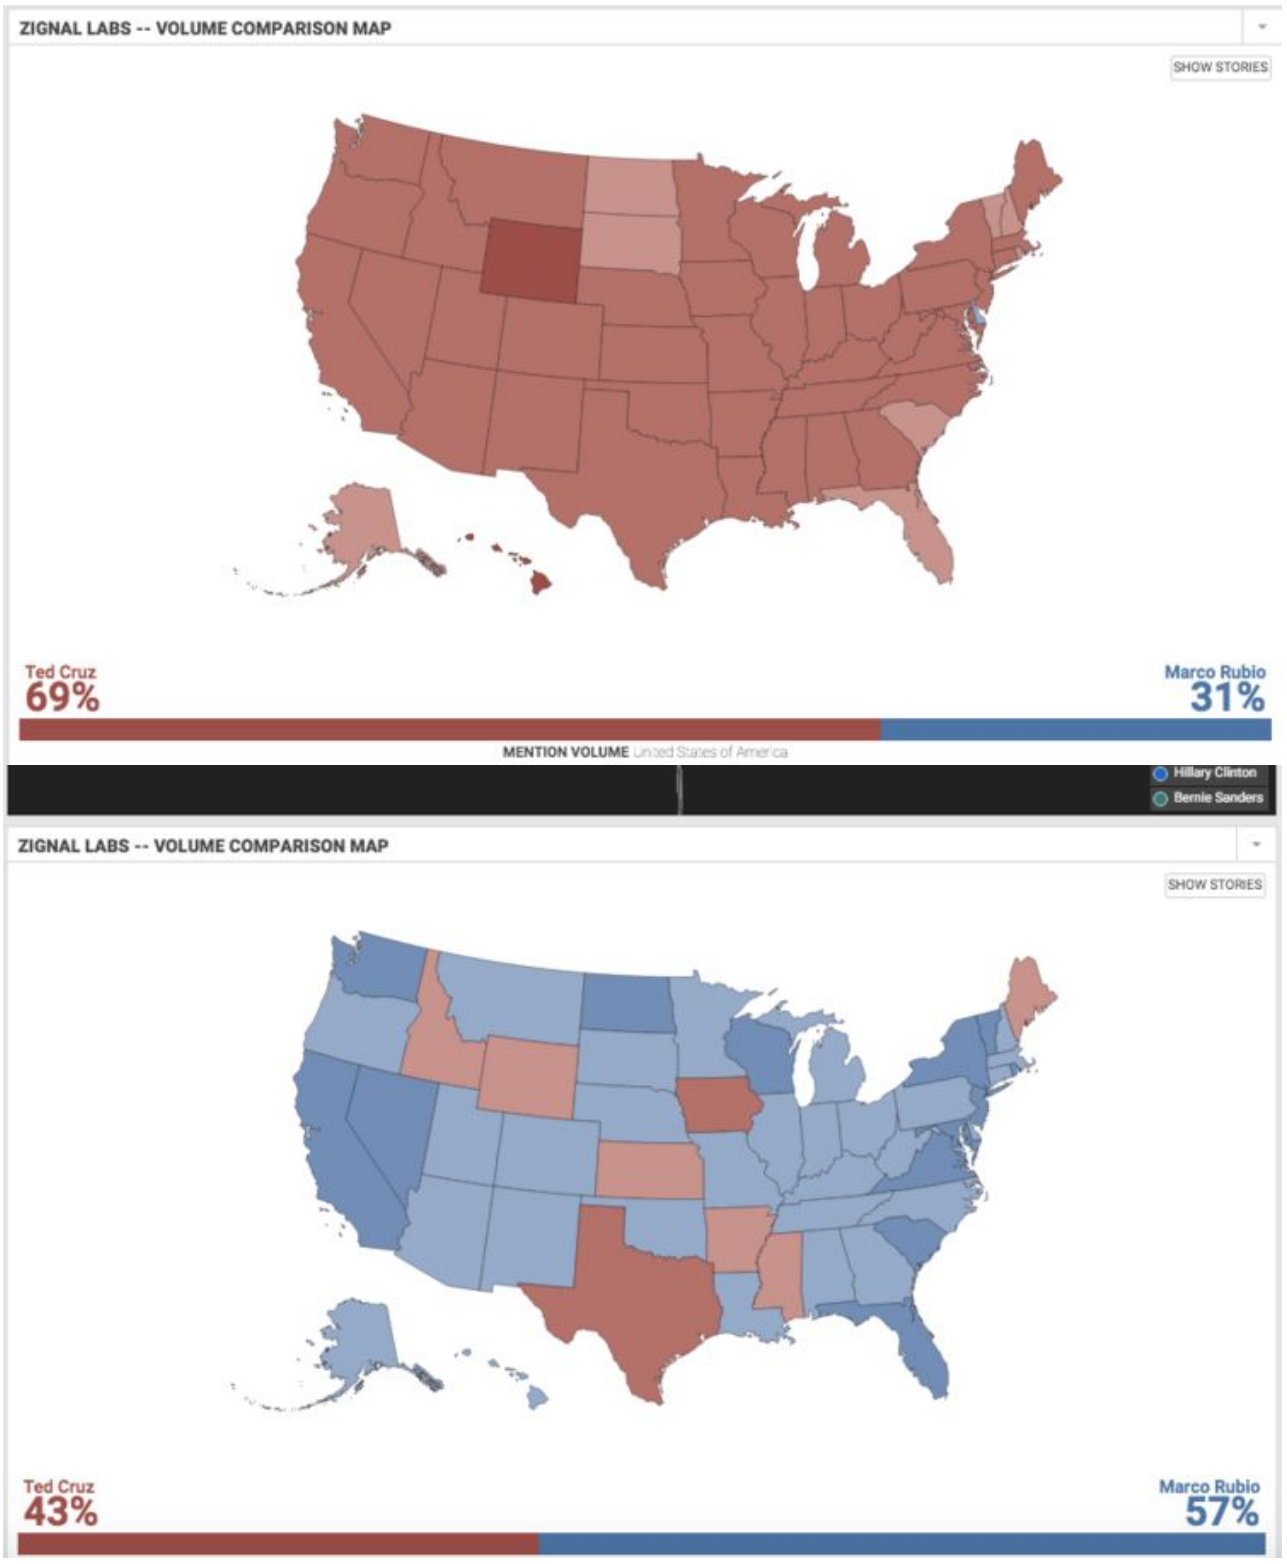
"Sanders continues to draw passionate support from the state's more liberal enclaves, notably Austin. While his campaign claims that he is still contesting the minority vote in Texas, the candidate has focused his time on areas where the liberal, white vote is most concentrated. On Saturday, he returned to Texas for the first time since July to rally a combined crowd of more than 17,000 in the Austin and Dallas areas. Both rallies were predominantly white, with sprinklings of younger Latinos and African Americans."

Clinton campaigned at two predominantly African American churches in Memphis yesterday, hoping to retain her advantage among black voters.

Hillary's new strategy is to cast herself as "the anti-Trump": "Aides see the 'unity' message as a newly refined way to link the campaign's policies and thematic elements with Clinton's own personal and political motivations — a piece of the campaign aides have struggled with for months," BuzzFeed's Ruby Cramer reports .

-- Bernie Sanders offered a new defense of his ambitious agenda in Fort Collins, Colorado. Sanders' team believes the Clinton attack that his ideas are pie-in-the-sky and have no chance of ever becoming law was a factor in his big South Carolina loss, John Wagner reports. So he tried to explain them a little better yesterday. "I believe that if you start your campaign and run on a platform calling for a full loaf, at worst you're gonna get a half loaf," the Vermont senator told a crowd of 6,500. "If you start your campaign talking about a need for a half loaf, you're going to get crumbs. And the American people today do not want, do not need crumbs. They need the whole loaf."

PIVOTING TO FLORIDA:



- Hillary's rally tomorrow night to react to the Super Tuesday results will be in Miami. (At Stage One at Ice Palace Films Studios)
- Rubio, who must win Florida on March 15 for his campaign to go on, will also have his event in Miami. (At the Ronald Reagan Equestrian Center at Tropical Park)
- Bernie's rally tomorrow night, meanwhile, will be in his home state of Vermont.

Americans Assaulted by Roman Catholic Police of New York City!

Native-born Protestant Americans clubbed and beaten when they exercise their rights in the country of their birth. Let us appeal to the fair-minded American citizens of Queens County to take your stand in defense of the fundamental principles of your country.

Liberty and Democracy have been trampled upon when native born Protestant Americans dare to organize to protect one flag, the American flag; one school, the public school, and one language, the English language; also when they march peaceably through the streets in honor of their forefathers.

We charge that the Roman Catholic police force did deliberately precipitate a riot and did tear down American flags and did unmercifully beat and club defenseless Americans who conducted themselves as gentlemen under trying conditions.

Book Questions Clinton Donations

http://www.nytimes.com/2015/04/20/us/politics/book-questions-clinton-donations.html?_r=0

The book does not hit shelves until May 5, but already the Republican Rand Paul has called its findings "big news" that will "shock people" and make voters "question" the candidacy of Hillary Rodham Clinton.

"Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich," by Peter Schweizer — a 186-page investigation of donations made to the Clinton Foundation by foreign entities — is proving the most anticipated and feared book of a presidential cycle still in its infancy.

The book, a copy of which was obtained by The New York Times, asserts that foreign entities who made payments to the Clinton Foundation and to Mr. Clinton through high speaking fees received favors from Mrs. Clinton's State Department in return.

"We will see a pattern of financial transactions involving the Clintons that occurred contemporaneous with favorable U.S. policy decisions benefiting those providing the funds," Mr. Schweizer writes.

His examples include a free-trade agreement in Colombia that benefited a major foundation donor's natural resource investments in the South American nation, development projects in the aftermath of the Haitian earthquake in 2010, and more than $1 million in payments to Mr. Clinton by a Canadian bank and major shareholder in the Keystone XL oil pipeline around the time the project was being debated in the State Department.

In the long lead up to Mrs. Clinton's campaign announcement, aides proved adept in swatting down critical books as conservative propaganda, including Edward Klein's "Blood Feud," about tensions between the Clintons and the Obamas, and Daniel Halper's "Clinton Inc.: The Audacious Rebuilding of a Political Machine."

But "Clinton Cash" is potentially more unsettling, both because of its focused reporting and because major news organizations are expected to pursue the story lines found in the book.

Members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee have been briefed about the book's findings, which have already made their way into several of the Republican presidential candidates' campaigns.

Conservative "super PACs" plan to seize on "Clinton Cash," and a pro-Democrat super PAC has already assembled a dossier on Mr. Schweizer, a speechwriting consultant to former President George W. Bush and a fellow at the conservative Hoover Institute, to make the case that he has a bias against Mrs. Clinton.

And the newly assembled Clinton campaign team is planning a full-court press to diminish the book as yet another conservative hit job.

Mr. Schweizer and a spokeswoman for HarperCollins, which is owned by News Corporation and is publishing the book, declined to comment.

The timing is problematic for Mrs. Clinton as she begins a campaign to position herself as a "champion for everyday Americans."

From 2001 to 2012, the Clintons' income was at least $136.5 million, Mr. Schweizer writes, using a figure previously reported in The Washington Post. "During Hillary's years of public service, the Clintons have conducted or facilitated hundreds of large transactions" with foreign governments, he writes. "Some of these transactions have put millions in their own pockets."

Continue reading the main story

The Clinton Foundation has come under scrutiny for accepting foreign donations while Mrs. Clinton served as secretary of state. Last week, the foundation revised its policy to allow donations from countries like Germany, Canada, the Netherlands and Britain but prohibit giving by other nations in the Middle East.

Mr. Schweizer's book will be released the same day former President Bill Clinton and the Clintons' daughter, Chelsea, will host the Clinton Global Initiative gathering with donors in Morocco, the culmination of a foundation trip to several African nations. (A chapter in the book is titled "Warlord Economics: The Clintons do Africa.")

There is a robust market for books critical of the Clintons. The thinly sourced "Blood Feud," by Mr. Klein, at one point overtook Mrs. Clinton's memoir "Hard Choices" on the best-seller list.

But whether Mr. Schweizer's book can deliver the same sales is not clear.

Mr. Schweizer writes mainly in the voice of a neutral journalist and meticulously documents his sources, including tax records and government documents, while leaving little doubt about his view of the Clintons.

His reporting largely focuses on payments made to Mr. Clinton for speeches, which increased while his wife served as secretary of state, writing that "of the 13 Clinton speeches that fetched $500,000 or more, only two occurred during the years his wife was not secretary of state."

In 2011, Mr. Clinton made $13.3 million in speaking fees for 54 speeches, the majority of which were made overseas, the author writes. Among the connections he tries to draw is a $750,000 speaking fee to Mr. Clinton by the Swedish telecom company Ericsson and a State Department list of new sanctions on Iran that did not include telecom.

Mr. Schweizer, president of the Government Accountability Institute, is the author of the 2013 book "Extortion: How Politicians Extract Your Money, Buy Votes, and Line Their Own Pockets," and "Throw Them All Out" about elected officials receiving insider stock tips.

Rockets Fired into Northern Israel After Air Strike Kills Kuntar

Three rockets were fired into northern Israel yesterday, in what was thought to be a revenge attack following the death of notorious Hezbollah-affiliated terrorist Samir Kuntar overnight Sunday. Three rockets landed in open spaces near the towns of Shlomi and Nahariya, where public bomb shelters were opened. No injuries or damage was reported. Media reports say that the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine was behind the firing. Israel shelled targets in southern Lebanon in response. The rocket fire was thought to be symbolic retribution for the death of arch-terrorist Samir Kuntar, who was killed in an early Sunday morning air strike on a suburb of the Syrian capital Damascus.

Israel Completes Final Missile Defense System Test

Israel said Monday it had successfully completed the final test of a joint U.S.-Israeli missile defense system before it is expected to become operational next year. The Defense Ministry said the David's Sling system had successfully intercepted targets in a series of tests conducted with the U.S. Missile Defense Agency, calling it the "final milestone." David's Sling is intended to counter medium-range missiles possessed by enemies throughout the region, most notably the Hezbollah . The system also aims to protect against low-altitude cruise missiles fired from longer distances.

Israeli Policy Shift: IDF Returning Palestinian Assailants' Bodies

After the security cabinet decided not to return the bodies of Palestinians killed while perpetrating terror attacks, Israel changed its course. On Friday, Hadil Awad's body, a 14-year-old Palestinian girl who was killed after carrying out a stabbing attack, was returned to her family. Since then, two bodies have been handed over—one was Mohannad al-Okbi who opened fire in the Be'er Sheva Bus Station. According to family members, police told them to sign documents pledging they would only hold a small funeral. Israel stopped the process of returning bodies of terrorists to families after Hebron funerals became demonstrations attended by thousands. Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon said two months ago that if the funerals were quiet, Israel would return the bodies of perpetrators.

Ministry's Doll Initiative Under Fire

Israeli Ambassador to Finland Dan Ashbel on Saturday criticized Deputy Foreign Minister Tzipi Hotovely's decision to distribute examples of dolls used to incite against Israel to all Israeli embassies, the idea being to demonstrate Palestinian demonization of Israel. Ashbel compared the initiative to distributing marijuana at every police station in order to permit them to demonstrate the dangers. Hotovely's approach is meant to show that Palestinian incitement is pervasive even among the smallest children.

Israeli Arab Cell Set Up Terror Infrastructure in East Jerusalem

A cell of Israel Arabs from the East Jerusalem neighborhood of Ras al-Amud involved in multiple instances of rock and Molotov cocktail throwing attacks has been arrested, Shin Bet announced Monday. The suspects directed their attacks against security forces and Jewish civilians in Ras al-Amud near the Mount of Olives cemetery. Islam Najar, 18, and Hamza Najar, 22, two brothers from Ras al-Amud were arrested by Shin Bet in October. The interrogation of the pair uncovered that they were involved in a number of Molotov cocktail and stone-throwing attacks directed against security forces. The investigation also revealed that the two minors took part in the burning of an Egged bus in September along with other members of the local terror infrastructure. The suspects described how they poured gasoline on the front of the bus and set it on fire after the driver fled the scene.

Protesters Demand Shin Bet Stop Abusing Jewish Prisoners

Hundreds of protesters have gathered outside the house of Shin Bet head Yoram Cohen, demanding the release of the Duma suspects. They are carrying signs reading "Jews don't torture Jews," and "Prosecutors stop persecuting." Four protesters were detained by authorities, then released several minutes later. The lawyers for the suspects, who are accused of arson and murder in the Arab village of Duma, held a press conference last week in which the declared it to be "a sad day for the justice system and the rule of law...Senior officers in the Shin Bet entered the interrogation room and used methods of torture and physical violence against a minor."

Turkey Demands Israel Meet Terms to Normalize Relations

Turkey is insisting on its demands in the effort to normalize relations with Israel. This includes a demand that Israel lift the siege on the Gaza Strip, apologize for the Mavi Marmara incident, and compensate the victims of the incident and their families. A spokesman for the ruling party in Ankara said at a press conference last night that Israel had only met one term until now, the apology. He added that the work to articulate the draft of the reconciliation agreement between the countries was still in progress and noted that there was no doubt that Israel and its citizens were friends of Turkey.

Erdogan Meets Hamas Leader Mashaal in Istanbul

Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan met with Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal in Istanbul on Saturday, according to presidential sources who spoke to the Turkish media. During the meeting the Hamas politburo chief, who is based in Qatar, informed Erdogan of "recent developments in the Middle East," the reports said. No other details about the meeting at Istanbul's Yildiz Palace were immediately available. The encounter was timed just days after Israel unveiled a series of steps to revive ties with Turkey that have been discussed in clandestine negotiations with Ankara.

A Calculated Strike

By Alex Fishman

Either this was a necessary preemptive strike on a ticking bomb or someone took a calculated risk—and erred.

We'll know the answer within a few days, or possibly even within a few hours. Only then will we know whether the rockets that were fired at the western Galilee—apparently by a Palestinian organization—were a token and perfunctory reaction, or whether they herald the beginning of another round of violence along the northern border.

In January this year, in the wake of the assassination of Jihad Mughniyah and an Iranian general on the Golan, we were very close to a military conflagration on the northern front. After a brief bloody round in which two IDF soldiers were killed, both Israel and Hezbollah gritted their teeth and stopped, since their vested interests prevented the situation from continuing to deteriorate. Will that be the case this time as well? The Northern Command has been on a heightened state of alert for the past two days in any event.

Hezbollah's top brass has probably spent the last few hours engaged in situation assessments with a view to its future actions. Hezbollah is subject to popular pressure, and developments that might unfold during Kuntar's funeral, which is to be held today in Beirut, could influence the situation along the border.

Samir Kuntar—notwithstanding his status as a symbol and his heinous past—was no Imad Mughniyah. Despite having been defined by the US administration as an international terrorist, in comparison to Hezbollah's chief of staff [Imad Mughniyah] who was assassinated in Damascus in 2008, he was only a small fish in the sea of regional terrorism. There had to have been an exceptionally good reason for someone to take the risk, to squander the credit that was given us to operate in Syria and to order a targeted killing operation against that man in the suburbs of Damascus. The only reason that could have justified his assassination in the Syrian capital—which is under the protection of the Russian air-defense umbrella, at the center of which is the S-400 missile system that has a radar range that covers large parts of Israel—would have been "concrete" intelligence about a terror attack that was to be carried out in the immediate future.

In a sane defense policy, revenge would not be an acceptable reason for Kuntar's assassination. Had Israel wanted to kill Kuntar either as an act of revenge, in order to send a signal to the Iranians and Hezbollah or to impress upon the security prisoners that a return to terrorism after being released in a prisoner exchange deal comes with a lethal price, there were dozens of opportunities to have done that since his release from prison in 2008.

Regardless of whether Israel was behind the strike or not, before any operation in Syria, the defense minister needs to ask his intelligence officers whether the operation in question is going to cross Hezbollah's red lines so that it is forced to retaliate in a way that might lead to a conflagration along the northern border. That is a key question since the Israeli interest is for Hezbollah to continue to bleed in Syria for many years to come and to be weakened without any Israeli involvement.

Hezbollah's behavior up until now indicated that as long as its weapons were struck on Syrian soil, it accepted those attacks as being fair play. Alternatively, when Jihad Mughniyah was killed, we almost ended up with a military conflagration in the north on our hands.

But Kuntar's status within Hezbollah is radically different. While he served as a symbol in the ongoing fight to release security prisoners held by Israel and was a popular hero of sorts, Hezbollah withdrew its patronage from him about a year ago. Kuntar nevertheless continued to pursue his military efforts independently, under the guidance of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards in Damascus.

It was not only Hezbollah that turned its back on Kuntar, but the regime in Damascus came to regard his activity in Syria as a threat to Assad's interests, since he was liable to drag Israel into a direct conflagration with Syria. The fact that both the Syrians and Hezbollah took exception to Kuntar's activity might serve to curb a possible deterioration.

The Russian presence in Syria is also a moderating factor, and might make Hezbollah respond with more restraint. A conflagration with Israel will not serve the Russian interests in Syria. If Israel was behind the Kuntar assassination, as the Syrians and Lebanese claim, the Russians—given their technological capabilities—knew about that operation in real time. The fact is that Moscow has remained silent, just as it ignored three similar cases of attacks in Syria that were ascribed to Israel.

Samir Kuntar apparently was under very close observation. Otherwise, the targeted killing operation that was carried out with such impressive success could not have been pulled off. Intelligence of that kind, which enabled his precise location to be determined and for missiles to be fired when no innocent civilians were in the vicinity, is not something that one stumbles upon by chance. It is the product of painstaking and very professional intelligence work.

Kuntar was killed in a building in Damascus that served, according to sources in Syria, not only as a residence for his men, but also as the operations center of his organization. According to those reports, Kuntar's spokesman and driver were killed as well, while several other members of his organization were injured. It looks like this was a golden opportunity to deliver a death blow to Samir Kuntar's organization. Now the ball is in Hezbollah's court.

What's Next for Middle East Peace?

By Uri Savir

US Secretary of State John Kerry came back from his recent trip to Jerusalem and Ramallah on Nov. 24 empty-handed and, for the first time for this extreme optimist, completely disillusioned with the stalled Israeli-Palestinian negotiations. He found Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu even more rejectionist than before, and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas weaker and more depressed. A senior US State Department official dealing with the Middle East described to Al-Monitor the current situation in very bleak terms. President Barack Obama's administration is fearing that the lack of any horizon of hope for the Palestinians will turn the current chaotic violence into a more organized and violent intifada.

Speaking on condition of anonymity, the State Department official complained about the state of relations between Washington and Jerusalem: "The policy gap vis-a-vis the Netanyahu government is of a strategic nature. The prime minister sees the use of force as a necessary policy option in any regional crisis. The Obama administration sees the use of force as a last option, to be used only after serious diplomacy is exhausted.

This was the case when negotiating the Iran deal. Now that the International Atomic Energy Agency has issued its report on Dec. 2 and concluded that, since 2009, Iran was not actively developing nuclear weapons, many in the administration ask what would have happened if the Republicans and Netanyahu would have had the upper hand in the congressional debate?" This, according to the source, is analogous to the past debate on the war in Iraq. Netanyahu backed then-President George W. Bush in the decision to go to war in the conviction that it would put an end to terrorism. The opposite was true; the Islamic State was born out of that war.

The conceptual differences between Obama and Netanyahu on the Palestinian issue are of a similar nature. At the same time, the senior State Department official said that Abbas was not forthcoming during Kerry's visit, conveying a sense of growing isolation and weakness within the Palestinian Authority.

Given this situation, State Department Middle East policy analysts are deliberating what positions and measures to take in order to stabilize the volatile situation on the ground and set a policy platform for a future two-state solution. According to the senior official, a variety of policy options are being considered.

The first option is a UN Security Council resolution on the renewal of negotiations with binding terms of references. Talks were held between US and French officials about such an eventuality. The French, together with New Zealand, are contemplating presenting a resolution to the Security Council that would base negotiations on a two-state solution on the 1967 lines for the border, with a timeline of two to three years for negotiations and implementation. Obama is very much opposed in principle to using the veto right, as he believes in compromise through collective diplomacy.

In this case, according to the senior official, the administration has not yet made up its mind. It is possible that it will abstain from its veto right if the language of the resolution includes policy components in Israel's favor regarding security measures and the recognition between two nation-states in order to end the conflict. Such positions are not acceptable to the Palestinians and the Arab countries. The veto, said the source, will eventually depend on the specific wording of the resolution.

A second option being considered is a written document that will consist of the content of the framework agreement proposal that Kerry conveyed in his talks to the parties in April 2014, which refers to the border being based on the 1967 lines with mutual land swaps, security agreements, a security zone along the Jordan River, a Palestinian capital in the East Jerusalem area, the recognition of Israel as the Jewish homeland, a just and agreed solution to the Palestinian refugee issue, and an end to the conflict and claims with the normalization of relations between the Arab states and Israel based on the Arab Peace Initiative of 2002. Such a document would be conveyed to the parties and the Middle East Quartet as an American terms of reference for future negotiations.

Another option that is on the American discussion table is a presidential policy speech referring to the same policy positions of the framework proposals. It would serve as a framework for future negotiations — "the Obama framework."

These possible American positions may seem futile, given the volatile situation in the region. Yet they are of significant importance — any of the three possibilities — to create a policy bridge to the next American presidency, whether he or she is a Democrat or a Republican.

Uri Savir has spent his professional life working on the strategies of peacemaking in Israel. In 1996, he established the Peres Center for Peace and is currently the center's honorary president.

Europe currently faces a number of challenges that threaten to derail the progress the European project has experienced over the previous decades. From the migration crisis to Russian aggression in Ukraine, to transnational terrorism, to the possibility of a “Brexit” and “Grexit,” these threats to stability are reaching a fever pitch. How is the EU dealing with these enormously challenging issues? How can the United States support our European partners? Does the EU have a grand strategy to guide the response to these challenges?

With these questions in mind, The German Marshall Fund of the United States (GMF) would like to invite you to a discussion with H.E. Miroslav Lajčák, deputy prime minister and minister of foreign and European affairs of the Slovak Republic. This event will be moderated by GMF President Karen Donfried.

Miroslav Lajčák is the deputy prime minister and minister of foreign and European affairs of the Slovak Republic, a role he has held since 2012. From 2010 to 2012, he served as the managing director of the European External Action Service (EEAS) for Russia, Eastern Neighborhood, and the Western Balkans. In that capacity, he served as the chief EU negotiator for the Moldova Association Agreements and the “5+2” talks on a Transnistria Settlement. From 2009 to 2010, Lajčák served as the Slovak minister of foreign affairs, from 2007 to 2009 he was the high representative and EU special representative in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and in 2006 he served as the EU envoy responsible for organizing a referendum on the independence of Montenegro. From 2005 to 2007, Lajčák was the director general for political affairs within the Slovak Ministry of Foreign Affairs. From 2001 to 2005, he served as the ambassador of the Slovak Republic to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (later Serbia and Montenegro), Republic of Albania, and the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. Lajčák is a graduate of the Moscow State Institute of International Relations, Comenius University, and the College of International and Security Studies at the George C. Marshall European Center for Security Studies in Garmisch-Partenkirchen, Germany.

Karen Donfried is president of The German Marshall Fund of the United States (GMF). Before assuming this role in April 2014, Donfried was the special assistant to the president and senior director for European affairs on the National Security Council at the White House. In that capacity, she was the president’s principal advisor on Europe and led the interagency process on the development and implementation of the president’s European policies. Prior to the White House, Donfried served as the national intelligence officer for Europe on the National Intelligence Council, the intelligence community’s center for strategic thinking. Donfried first joined GMF in 2001 after having served for ten years as a European specialist at the Congressional Research Service. From 2003 to 2005, she was responsible for the Europe portfolio on the U.S. Department of State's Policy Planning Staff. Her second term of service at GMF was 2005 to 2010, first as senior director of policy programs and then as executive vice president.

Subject: Re: [big campaign] The Ultimate Viewer's Guide to Romney's Post-Truth Campaign

This is an excellent round up from Think Progress! We at Media Matters have seen all of these lies unfold, and picked out the two biggest lies (Obama cut Medicare to pay for Obamacare and Obama gutted welfare reform) and analyzed how news outlets were treating both claims and classified their news stories into three categories: debunked, provided he said/she said hogwash, or provided absolutely no pushback while simply transcribing Romney's false claims.

Despite looking at Washington Post, Wall Street Journal, AP, New York Times, CNN, MSNBC & Fox, you probably won't be surprised to learn the NewsCorp outlets were the worst at providing accurate information in the face of Romney's lies. If Mitt Romney insists on basing his campaign in falsehoods, all of our media must provide clear, concise debunking of his lies. You can see fancy charts and solid debunking bullets at the link:

REPORT: How The Media Covered Two Romney Falsehoods

RESEARCH ›››

Two recent falsehoods from the Mitt Romney campaign have received media attention: the false claim that President Obama removed the work requirement from welfare, and the false claim that the health care reform bill "cuts" $716 billion from Medicare. While many mainstream media outlets debunked the false claims in much of their coverage, several -- particularly Fox News and The Wall Street Journal -- repeatedly failed to debunk the falsehoods.

FACTS MATTER: The Ultimate Guide To Mitt Romney's Convention Speech

By ThinkProgress on Aug 30, 2012 at 10:36 am

Politicians from both parties twist facts or spin policy, but Mitt Romney's presidential campaign has had a particularly strained relationship with the truth, repeating false claims with impunity — even after fact checkers, mainstream media organizations, and blogs have all debunked their assertions.

Romney on His Tax Plan

"The highest income people will continue to pay the largest share of the tax burden and middle-income taxpayers, under my plan… So, we're not going to reduce taxes for high-income people." [CBS, 8/12/2012]

> REALITY: Under Romney's plan, someone in the richest 1 percent of Americans would receive a $60,000 tax cut, while someone in the richest 0.1 percent would receive a $264,000 tax cut. Even under the most generous assumptions about the elimination of tax deductions — so assuming Romney eliminates loopholes and deductions in the most progressive way possible — millionaires still receive an $87,000 tax cut, while the middle-class sees their taxes go up. [Tax Policy Center, 2/23/2012 ; Tax Policy Center, 8/1/2012]

"The people in the middle, the hard-working Americans, are the people who need a break, and that is why I focused my tax cut right there." [GOP debate, 10/11/2011]

> REALITY: A Tax Policy Center analysis of Romney plan showed that — even under the most generous assumptions — Romney's plan raises taxes on everyone making less than $200,000. Middle-class families would see their taxes go up by $2,000 per year. [Tax Policy Center, 8/1/2012]

"The U.S. economy's 35 percent corporate tax rate is among the highest in the industrial world, reducing the ability of our nation's businesses to compete in the global economy and to invest and create jobs at home," Romney's website reads. [MittRomney.com, 8/16/2012]

> REALITY: While America has the second-highest corporate tax rate on paper, once all of the loopholes, credits, and deductions are accounted for, its corporate tax rate is the second-lowest in the developed world. The U.S. raises far less in corporate taxes as a percentage of its economy than other nations, including the UK and Canada. Many of America's most profitable corporations pay literally no taxes. [Citizens for Tax Justice, 6/30/2011, 4/9/2012 ; Center for American Progress, 6/10/2011

Romney on Wall Street

"Look, no one is talking about deregulating Wall Street." [ThinkProgress , 8/15/2012]

> REALITY: Romney has called for the full repeal of the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform Act, the first major overhaul of the nation's financial regulatory system since the Great Depression, and while he has supported a "streamlined regulatory framework," the only specific regulations he mentions in his plan are already in Dodd-Frank. His own running mate is certainly talking about deregulating Wall Street: the House GOP budget authored by Ryan dismantles key parts of the law. [ThinkProgress, 8/25/2011 , 8/13/2012 , 8/15/2012]

"The rate of regulatory burden has increased four-fold since Obama has become president. Four times the amount of regulation coming out per year as in the past. And so businesses say, 'gosh, I'm not sure I want to invest in America.'" [ThinkProgress, 12/12/2011]

REALITY: Obama approved 613 new rules during his first 33 months, 4.7 percent fewer than Bush did in the same timespan. The campaign initially claimed that "the governor misspoke" in levying the charge, but Romney keeps using it. [NPR, 9/9/2011 , Bloomberg, 10/25/2011]

Romney on the Budget

Romney claims that, as governor of Massachusetts, "we didn't just slow the rate of growth of our government, we actually cut it." [CBN, 5/14/2012]

REALITY: Government spending increased by an average of 5 percent per year during Romney's tenure in office. [Politifact, 5/21/2012]

President Obama has "racked up as much debt as almost all of the other presidents combined." [NYT, 12/16/2011]

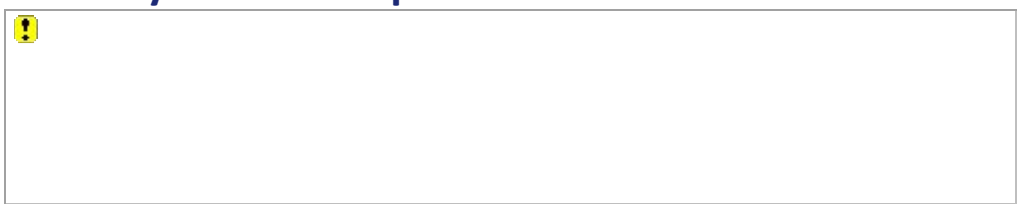
REALITY: When Obama took office, the national debt stood at $10.626 trillion. When Romney made this claim in December 2011, the national debt was a bit over $15 trillion. That $4.5 trillion increase is nowhere near as much debt as all the other presidents combined. Even if you just consider the portion of the debt that is owed to private investors, as Romney's campaign has pointed to, the numbers still don't add up. When Obama took office this figure was at $6.307 trillion and had increased by approximately $4 trillion when Romney made this claim. [NYT, 12/16/2011]

"The President's vision is one of a larger and larger government, taking more and more, and trying to provide more and more to you…It takes us on a road to Europe." [Toledo Blade,8/25/2012]

REALITY: Romney is calling for the sort of austerity that's been adopted in Europe, which has unnecessarily blunted economic growth. In fact, the European governments that have embraced austerity the most have seen the largest contractions in their economies. The U.S. is doing better in terms of economic growth than both the Eurozone and the United Kingdom, both of which have adopted the kind of heavy spending cuts Romney favors. [ThinkProgress, 7/26/2012 , 5/7/2012]

"What the president is proposing is therefore a massive tax increase on job creators and on small business. Small businesses are overwhelmingly being taxed not at a corporate rate but at the individual tax rate. So successful small businesses will see their taxes go up dramatically, and that will kill jobs." [Los Angeles Times, 7/9/2012]



REALITY: President Obama's plan to allow the Bush tax cuts to expire on income in excess of $250,000 would affect exceedingly few small businesses. The Joint Committee on Taxation estimated that the expiration would affect only three percent of individuals with any business income, from a business large or small. [Joint Committee on Taxation, 7/12/2010]

"I will remove the crippling uncertainty that is preventing businesses from hiring." [Real Clear Politics, 8/14/12]

REALITY: Several surveys and economic analyses have shown that there is no truth to the claim that uncertainty is preventing businesses from hiring; they're not hiring because they simply don't have enough customers with the economy still recovering. Conservative economist Bruce Bartlett said, "regulatory uncertainty is a canard invented by Republicans that allows them to use current economic problems to pursue an agenda supported by the business community year in and year out." Romney on Bain Capital

"I'm very happy in my former life; we helped create over 100,000 new jobs," Romney says, suggesting that he helped create more jobs than President Obama. [ThinkProgress, 1/4/2012]

> REALITY: The 100,000 statistic is a cherry-picked jobs number from a few companies that did well after they were bought by Bain and "does not include job losses from other companies with which Bain Capital was involved — and are based on current employment figures, not the period when Romney worked at Bain." In January, the Romney campaign finally conceded that Romney could not have created a total of 100,000 jobs at Bain, admitting, "This tally obviously does not include job losses from other companies with which Bain Capital was involved — and are based on current employment figures, not the period when Romney worked at Bain." The campaign has since downgraded the number of jobs to "thousands." [Washington Post, 1/4/2012]

Romney on Obamacare

Romney claims repealing Obamacare "saves" $90 billion over the next four years. [ThinkProgress, 11/4/2011]

> REALITY: Repealing Obamacare would increase the federal budget deficit by about $109 billion from 2013 to 2022, the Congressional Budget Office concludes. "Deficits would be increased under H.R. 6079 because the net savings from eliminating the insurance coverage provisions would be more than offset by the combination of other spending increases and revenue reductions," the budget office says. [Congressional Budget Office, 7/24/2012]

"Obamacare adds trillions to our deficits and to our national debt." [The Hill, 6/28/2012]

> REALITY: According to the Congressional Budget Office, Obamacare reduces the deficit by $124 billion over 10 years and even more after that. [Politifact,6/28/2012]

After the Supreme Court upheld the individual mandate, Romney declared, "And while I agreed with the dissent, that's taken over by the fact that the majority of the Court said it is a tax, and therefore it is a tax." [CBS, 7/4/2012]

> REALITY: Romney instituted a similar requirement in Massachusetts and insisted as governor that the penalty is a way to discourage free-riders. Incidentally, Obamacare will provide millions of families with large tax credits to help purchase coverage and only about 1 percent of Americans who could afford health care but don't buy insurnace would pay the fine, which would average about $600. [CAP, 7/5/2012]

Romney on Medicare

"And my campaign has made it very clear: the President's cuts of $716 billion to Medicare, those cuts are going to be restored if I become President and Paul Ryan becomes Vice President." [CBS, 8/15/2012]

> REALITY: Obama is not robbing Medicare. In fact, the billions in Obamacare savings will slow the growth of Medicare over the next decade by eliminating overpayments to private insurers, reforming provider payments to encourage greater efficiency, tying reimbursements to improvements in economic productivity, and reducing fraud and abuse. As a result, the program's trust fund will remain solvent until 2024. If Romney restores these savings — which Ryan included in his own budget — he would hasten Medicare's insolvency to 2016. [Politifact, 8/15/2012 ; NYT 8/22/2012]

Romney says that he and Ryan "want to make sure that we preserve and protect Medicare." [CBS, 8/13/2012]

REALITY: The claim that "premium support" will save Medicare for future generations is highly misleading. The federal government will spend less on the program because future will have to pay more. [CAP, 8/24/2012]

"Nothing changes for current seniors or those nearing retirement," Romney's website claims. [MittRomney.com, 8/30/2012]

REALITY: Here is how Ryan's Medicare plan will affect current seniors: 1) by repealing Obamacare, the 16 million seniors receiving preventive benefits without deductibles or co-pays and are saving $3.9 billion on prescription drugs will see a cost increase, 2) "premium support" will increase premiums for existing beneficiaries as private insurers lure healthier seniors out of the traditional Medicare program. [CAP, 8/24/2012]

Romney on Women's Health

Romney claimed that under Obamacare, "the Catholic Church had to provide for insurance that provided contraceptives, sterilization, morning after pills to the employees of the Church." [ThinkProgress, 2/21/2012]

REALITY: All houses of worship, including the Catholic Church, are specifically exempt from the rule requiring employers to provide preventive services like contraception to their employees. And for religiously affiliated organizations, the insurance company will be required to offer the coverage free of charge and the employer will not pay for it. [ThinkProgress, ">3/23/2012]

Romney argued that the contraception mandate would force employers to offer "abortive pills" free of charge. [ThinkProgress, 5/8/2012]

REALITY: Forms of contraception like hormonal birth control pills and the morning after pill do not work as "abortive" medication. These benefits will only prevent a pregnancy before fertilization. [ThinkProgress, 3/2/2012]

Romney on Energy

Obama has "already taken over" the energy industry, and is "waging a war" on coal and oil. [LA Times, 8/14/2012]

REALITY: In the last four years, oil production has exploded, hitting an eight-year high as oil exports shrunk to less than 50 percent for the first time since 1949. According to the Mine Safety and Health Administration, coal industry employment has grown to reach its highest level since 1996, up 6.7 percent in West Virginia, and 2.3 percent in Pennsylvania. Coal layoffs and shuttered plants Romney points to can be blamed on economic forces, not regulations, as utilities move toward attractive investment in cheap natural gas. [Charleston Gazzette, 11/18/2011 ; West Virginia Center on Budget & Policy, 5/12/2012 ; EIA,11/30/2011 ; Climate Progress, 6/23/2012]

"An independent inspector general looked at [the Solyndra] investment and concluded that the administration had steered money to friends and family and campaign contributors." [Fortune,6/4/2012]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

REALITY: No investigation of Solyndra has ever found any "smoking guns."Another independent review of all Department Of Energy loan programs by Herb Allison found no wrongdoing. CNN Money reported that Romney thoroughly mischaracterized the Solyndra facts, and "to make the other guy look bad." A majority of the loan-application process for Solyndra occurred under the Bush administration. [Fortune, 3/27/2012 ; Politico, 5/29/2012]

Romney says he would would end tax credits for wind energy to create "a level playing field on which all sources of energy can compete on their merits." [Des Moines Register, 8/5/2012]

REALITY: Romney has no interest in closing $4 billion tax loopholes that benefit oil and gas companies. His tax plan even doubles the $2.4 billion the five largest oil companies already receive in taxpayer dollars. While the Congressional Research Service notes that closing oil's loopholes would have little to no impact on production or gas prices, wind tax credits has been essential to spurring billions in private investment in the relatively young industry. [American Progress, 7/26/2012 ; CRS, 5/11/2012 ; Energy.gov,8/14/2012]

"[Obama] rejected the Keystone XL pipeline, which would have dramatically increased the supply of Canadian oil to the U.S. market, and now Canada plans to send that oil to China instead," Romney's energy plan says, promising to approve the project. [MittRomney.com, 8/23/2012]

REALITY: The Keystone XL pipeline would ship tar sands crude across the country to be processed at Gulf Coast refineries and sold on the international market. Therefore, the pipeline would do virtually nothing to make America more energy independent. In some cases, it would actually raise the price of gasoline in the Midwest because the pipeline would surpass refineries in the region. In fact, the Congressional Budget Office recently concluded that the only way to protect Americans from oil and gas price shocks is to become more efficient and use less oil, not increase consumption. Finally, construction and operation of Keystone XL would only create 6,000 jobs, according to figures from TransCanada, the company building the project – not 20,000 as Romney and other proponents have claimed. [Washington Post, 3/2/2012 ; Congressional Budget Office, 5/9/2012; Inside Climate News, 1/18/2012]

Romney on Global Warming

"My view is that we don't know what's causing climate change on this planet. And the idea of spending trillions and trillions of dollars to try to reduce CO2 emissions is not the right course for us." [ThinkProgress, 10/28/2011]

REALITY: 97 percent of published, leading scientists agree that carbon pollution is causing climate change. The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change has documented in exhaustive detail that global warming is 90 percent likely to be due to man-made greenhouse pollution. And a Koch-funded scientist has reversed himself, convinced by his own data that "humans are almost entirely the cause" of global warming, and even finding the IPCC didn't go far enough. [NYT, 7/30/2012]

Romney on the Auto Bailout

"I pushed the idea of a managed bankruptcy, and finally when that was done and help was given, the companies got back on their feet. So I'll take a lot of credit for the fact that this industry's come back." [The Hill, 5/8/2012]

REALITY: Romney claimed credit for the outcome of a process that played out in direct opposition to his preferred game plan. In a 2008 op-ed, Romney called for managed bankruptcy, but later opposed the government's bailout, claiming that unions were not forced to make sufficient sacrifices. Auto industry insiders have called Romney's preferred approach "fantasy." [CNBC, 6/12/2012]

Romney on Welfare Reform

"Under Obama's plan, you wouldn't have to work and wouldn't have to train for a job. They just send you your welfare check," a Romney campaign ad says. [CBS, 8/7/2012]

REALITY: The administration's welfare waiver initiative would strengthen work requirements by empowering states to innovate on strategies that could move 20 percent more of the caseload into sustainable employment. As the government's directive announcing the initiative notes, "The Secretary is only interested in approving waivers if the state can explain in a compelling fashion why the proposed approach may be a more efficient or effective means to promote employment entry, retention, advancement, or access to jobs that offer opportunities for earnings and advancement that will allow participants to avoid dependence on government benefits." Republican and Democratic governors — and even Romney and Paul Ryan — have all promoted flexibility before Obama embraced it. [HHS, 7/12/2012]

Romney on Food Stamps

"What unfortunately happens is with all the multiplicity of federal programs, you have massive overhead, with government bureaucrats in Washington administering all these programs, very little of the money that's actually needed by those that really need help, those that can't care for themselves, actually reaches them," Romney said of the food stamp program. [MSNBC, 1/8/12]

REALITY: The food stamp program has relatively little overhead administrative costs — about 15.8 cents on the dollar. That's about an average for the cost of a government-administered program. Plus, as the Washington Post points out, "That means almost 85 cents gets to the people who need the help." [Brookings, 3/2008 ; Washington Post, 1/8/2012]

Romney on Security

"He went around the world and apologized for America," said Mitt Romney, reiterating a common Romney campaign and right-wing talking point. [9/22/11]

REALITY: The Washington Post's fact checker gave this statement "four Pinocchios," saying, "Take it from us: The apology tour never happened." PolitiFact.com also took aim at Romney's false claim, giving it a "Pants on Fire" rating. "We found not a single, full-throated apology" in Obama's speeches while abroad, PolitiFact says, adding, "we think it's a ridiculous charge." [The Washington Post 12/10/11 ; PolitiFact.com 9/22/11]

President Obama alone is responsible for the $500 billion in military spending sequester. [Chicago Tribune, 5/19/2012]

REALITY: In fact, under the Budget Control Act, many Republicans voted in favor of the spending sequester. 28 Republican senators and 174 Republican members of the House backed the measure. [ThinkProgress, 5/20/

2012; Roll Call, 8/2/2011 ; Roll Call, 8/1/2011]

In an op-ed attacking Obama's Iran policy and ratcheting up the war rhetoric, Romney claimed that the Islamic Republic has a "nuclear bomb program." [Washington Post, 3/5/2012]

> REALITY: Top American officials, the International Atomic Energy Agency and U.S. and Israeli intelligence all recently said that while Iran may be moving toward a nuclear weapons capability, the regime has not made a decision to build a bomb. [ThinkProgress, 3/5/2012]

Obama has thrown Israel "under the bus." [Bloomberg, 7/3/2012]

> REALITY: Obama has ramped up security cooperation with Israel, providing specialized bombs that the Bush administration had once refused to hand off, funding Israel's "Iron Dome" missile defense system to the tune of $275 million, and approving the billions of dollars in defense aid packages passed by Congress every year. Israel's top leaders are immensely appreciative — Defense Minister Ehud Barak has said, "this administration under President Obama is doing in regard to our security more than anything that I can remember in the past," President Shimon Peres claimed that "When I look at the record of President Obama concerning the major issue security I think it's a highly satisfactory record from Israeli point of view," and Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu said Obama merited "a badge of honor" for diplomatic support during the Palestinian statehood bid at the United Nations. [Newsweek, 9/23/2011 ; Arutz Sheva 7, 5/17/2012 ; CNN, 7/30/2012 ; CNN,7/31/2012; Politico, 9/21/2011]

Romney claimed Obama "went before the United Nations" and "said nothing about thousands of rockets being rained in on Israel from the Gaza Strip." [CNN, 1/26/2012]

> REALITY: In his 2011 U.N. address, Obama said, "Israel is surrounded by neighbors that have waged repeated wars against it. Israel's citizens have been killed by rockets fired at their houses and suicide bombs on their buses." The 2009 speech also decried rocket fire falling on the Israeli town of Sderot, saying "We must remember that the greatest price of this conflict is not paid by us. It is paid by the Israeli girl in Sderot who closes her eyes in fear that a rocket will take her life in the night. It is paid by the Palestinian boy in Gaza who has no clean water and no country to call his own." [White House Transcript,9/21/2011 ; New York Times, 9/23/2009]

Romney on LGBT Rights

Romney claims that he "fully supports the rights of gay individuals and homosexuals." [NBC,12/16/2007

> REALITY: Romney often makes this claim in the same sentence as he expresses his opposition to marriage equality. He also opposes federal nondiscrimination protections for LGBT people. [Salt Lake Tribune, 10/7/2010]

Romney says same-sex couples have a "legitimate interest" in adoption and "obviously, that's their right." [Boston Globe, 3/14/2006]

> REALITY: Though Romney "acknowledges" that some states recognize same-sex adoptions, he has said multiples times that same-sex parents are harmful to children, telling Religious Right groups in 2006 that "the price of same-sex marriage is paid by the children." [CNS News, 10/12/2011 ; RightWingWatch.org,5/15/2012]

"We're not going to force people of faith to violate their faith in order to carry out their profession," Romney said, explaining that Catholic Charities in Massachusetts "had to get out of adoptions because they would not, under their faith, place children in the homes of same-sex couples." [ThinkProgress, 9/5/2011]

> REALITY: Catholic Charities received public funds but refused to place children with same-sex couples in spite of Massachusetts' inclusive law. It could have continued making this distinction by continuing to operate on > private funding only, but it voluntarily chose to shut down instead. Romney believes the government should subsidize religious groups even if they discriminate against gays. [Palmetto Freedom Forum, 9/5/2011]

Associated Press: “2016ers Jockey Even Before Congressional Elections”

By Steve Peoples and Ken Thomas

September 1, 2014, 10:09 a.m. EDT

PORTSMOUTH, N.H. (AP) -- One set of elections ends in early November as another begins when presidential hopefuls cross the unofficial starting line in the 2016 race for the White House.

With control of the Senate at stake, the months leading up to the mid-term elections offer a clearer window on a crowd of potential presidential candidates already jockeying for position from Nevada to New Hampshire. Their cross-country touring will intensify this fall under the gaze of voters who will pick their parties' nominees. Look for the would-be contenders to road-test rhetoric, expand coalitions, and consider their own political flaws-while keeping close watch on each other.

Democrats want Hillary Rodham Clinton to carry their flag; the Republican field remains crowded, and wide open. The presidential jousting will be most apparent in states like New Hampshire, home to the first-in-the-nation presidential primary and the site of closely-watched races for governor, Senate and the House.

Whichever party controls the Senate after the November 4 balloting-Republicans need a six-seat gain to win the majority-will say much about what President Barack Obama can accomplish in the final two years of his presidency and the tone of the race to succeed him.

"The end of the 2014 general election does, in a sense, commence a beginning of the presidential primary phase," says New Hampshire Republican operative Rich Killion. "But an informal, unofficial opening to the process already is underway."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here's a look at potential 2016 candidates and what to expect this fall:

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON:

The former secretary of state's every word will be parsed for her future plans. But Clinton has been offering plenty of hints that she's preparing for another campaign.

Her biggest splash could come in Iowa, where she'll join her husband at Sen. Tom Harkin's annual steak fry fundraiser in Indianola on Sept. 14. The event is billed as a tribute to Harkin, but will generate wide interest as Clinton's first visit to Iowa since losing the 2008 caucuses.

Clinton has limited her campaign activity since leaving the State Department, but this fall should give voters a more concrete look at how she might present her candidacy. Her allies are wary of a "third Obama term" label, so Clinton's speeches and appearances offer a chance to distinguish herself from the president.

She will raise money for Democrats' four major campaign committees and could help several Senate campaigns where Obama remains a liability.

JOE BIDEN:

Vice President Joe Biden has not ruled out a third presidential bid and expects to be an active surrogate for Democrats this fall. Whether he'd challenge Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination remains the big question.

Biden headlined high-profile meetings with young voters, liberals and African-Americans. He's also raised money for congressional candidates in Nevada and incumbent governors in Connecticut and Illinois. Biden is expected to visit New Hampshire, where he maintains ties to party activists, and Iowa, where Rep. Bruce Braley faces Joni Ernst in one of the top Senate battlegrounds.

OTHER DEMOCRATS:

Several Democrats are building for a national campaign in case Clinton doesn't run - or considering a longshot challenge.

Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley has been the most active, raising money for candidates in Iowa and New Hampshire and traveling to states with active mid-term contests.

Former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb recently traveled to Iowa. Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, an independent who caucuses with Democrats, plans to visit the Hawkeye State in mid-September. Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren has denied interest in the White House but would face pressure to run if Clinton doesn't.

JEB BUSH

More than seven years out of office, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush has been quieter than some of his GOP colleagues as he focuses on his private business dealings.

He recently said he'd begin a more aggressive schedule to help Republicans this fall. He's set to headline a Florida fundraiser in late September to benefit top Republican Senate candidates, a group expected to include Cory Gardner in Colorado, Ernst in Iowa, Monica Wehby in Oregon and Tom Cotton in Arkansas.

RAND PAUL

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul has been perhaps the most aggressive prospective candidate.

The ophthalmologist recently squeezed in a mission to perform eye surgeries in Guatemala-and invited news organizations to cover it-between stops in Iowa and South Carolina. He's confirmed September appearances in California and Virginia, and October visits to North Carolina and New Hampshire, among dozens more possible stops.

The libertarian-leaning Paul, the son of former Texas Rep. Ron Paul, is trying to build on the small but passionate coalition assembled by his father. The elder Paul wasn't taken seriously by many Republicans, but Rand Paul has emerged as a leading GOPvoice on foreign and domestic policy.

CHRIS CHRISTIE

Working to move past a bridge-clogging scandal that shadowed his plans, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie continues an aggressive travel schedule this fall as chairman of the Republican Governors Association.

Having already visited New Hampshire, he's announced a trip to South Carolina, where he'll have a chance to test his message with more conservative voters. He's also planning trips to Ohio, Wisconsin and Florida.

Christie leads a delegation of New Jersey business and political leaders to Mexico in early September, a trip that gives him a chance to bolster his appeal with Latino voters and burnish his foreign policy chops. And at home, Christie will unveil a budget plan that is sure to draw fury from Democrats and union leaders.

RICK PERRY

Eyeing a second presidential bid, Texas Gov. Rick Perry was already facing challenges related to his disastrous 2012 campaign before his recent felony indictments.

His advisers suggest the charges could actually help his political prospects, and he has pressed ahead with visits to Iowa, Washington, D.C., New Hampshire, and more.

Perry heads to Iowa in early September shortly before a weeklong economic tour across Asia. He'll turn his attention to helping Republican governors win reelection when he returns.

The Texas governor will launch a European tour in October.

OTHER REPUBLICANS:

MSNBC: “Hillary super PAC makes moves in South Carolina”

With Hillary Clinton giving few public appearances ahead of a possible presidential run, some Democrats are happy to take the next best thing.

Former Michigan Gov. Jennifer Granholm is headlining a major Democratic event in South Carolina later this month on behalf of Ready for Hillary, the pro-Clinton super PAC. The South Carolina Democratic Party, which puts on the annual Blue Jamboree fundraiser, perhaps the biggest Democratic event in the state, reached out to Ready for Hillary to secure Granholm's appearance, according to a source familiar with the planning.

At the event, Granholm will deliver a $5,000 check from Ready for Hillary to the state party, bringing the super PAC's total contributions to the federal maximum of $10,000. It cut a another $5,000 check to the state party in June. The group has donated to more than two dozen state party committees, including all of the early primary states.

It's the first time a state party has asked Ready for Hillary for a surrogate at a high-profile event like this. And it's all part of the super PAC's mission to build relationships and curry favor with local officials during the 2014 election cycle in lieu of Clinton herself, who has no political staff and is still technically a private citizen. (Clinton and the group cannot coordinate by law).

"Ready for Hillary is proud to support the efforts of the South Carolina Democratic Party in this year's election and beyond, and we will continue to channel the energy and organization around a potential Hillary 2016 candidacy to help SCDPand 2014 candidates," Seth Bringman, the super PAC's communications director, told msnbc.

The super PAC will also use its massive list to find supporters in South Carolina and encourage them to purchase tickets to the Jamboree, much as they are doing now ahead of Clinton's appearance at an Iowa Democratic Party event earlier in September.

As with Iowa, Clinton's struggles in South Carolina in 2008 will loom large if she decides to run again. Then-Sen. Barack Obama more than doubled Clinton's vote share – 55% to 26% – after Bill Clinton made a series of comments that offended some African-Americans, who are the key Democratic voting base in the Southern state.

Martin O'Malley, the Democratic governor of Maryland who is also considering a presidential bid, announced last week that he's sending four staffers from his leadership PAC to help Democrats in South Carolina during the midterms.

Ready for Hillary's campaign-style bus also visited the state recently, making the rounds of South Carolina colleges in mid-August. "Students were drawn in by the Hillary Bus and the free Hillary posters, but we were then able to tell them about the critical elections taking place this year, and we'll continue that conversation between now and November 4 to make sure they vote and get involved," added Bringman, who was at all five stops. The bus will return to the state for the Jamboree and a Pride parade the week before.

Tickets for the Blue Jamboree, which will be held in North Charleston on September 27, start at $10 and go up to $250. The rest of the speakers announced so far are mostly local to South Carolina.

National Journal: "Why Democrats Are Headed for Vegas"

By Michael Catalini

September 2, 2014

The Democratic Party's center of gravity will tilt toward Sin City this week.

That's because on Thursday in Las Vegas possible presidential contender Hillary Clinton and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid will preside over the senator's eighth clean-energy summit, an event that is emerging as a key stop in Nevada and Democratic Party politics.

Superficially, the event gives green business leaders and policymakers an opportunity to swap ideas and map out a sustainable course for Nevada's and the nation's energy sectors.

Summit organizers say they've attracted 10,000 supporters in the Silver State, with 250 businesses pledging to back clean-energy policies, according to Lydia Ball, executive director of the Clean Energy Project, which puts on the summit.

Businesses interested in hosting an exhibit at the Mandalay Bay Convention Center will have to pay between $4,000 and $5,000 for a booth at the event—"a boutique trade show," as Ball calls it. And 28 exhibition booths are expected, according to an internal tally.

But the summit is also a hive of political activity.

The event is sponsored by Reid and the liberal think tank Center for American Progress, among others, and has attracted some of the biggest names in politics.

Former President Bill Clinton and former Vice President Al Gore have headlined the event. Two years ago Nevada Gov. Brian Sandoval spoke there. White House counselor and former Clinton Chief of Staff John Podesta is also a regular attendee, and at last year's event two party fundraisers were held at the same location as the summit, according to local media reports.

"I don't want to insult former President Clinton by suggesting his wife is a bigger name," said former Reid aide Jim Manley, who regularly attended the event. "[But] it's all about getting big names to come to the state. There's a lot of networking going on. There's a lot of cross-pollination."

Podesta will be speaking this year, as will CAP head Neera Tanden. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, Rep. Dina Titus of Nevada, and former Housing and Urban Development Secretary Henry Cisneros will also be on hand.

It's not just the headliners who are politically inclined. Many of the panelists have doubled as campaign donors: Ormat Technologies' Yoram Bronicki, for example, is expected to discuss leapfrogging technology. But he's also given to Reid and the Senate Democrats' campaign arm this cycle, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

Other panelists who are also Democratic donors include Rose McKinney-James of Energy Works Consulting, Patricia Wagner of Sempra Energy, and Amory Lovins of the Rocky Mountain Institute.

"There's a lot of like-minded people there, including top policymakers," Manley said.

Those policymakers are certainly a draw for many of the small-business owners who plan to attend. But clean-energy entrepreneurs downplay the political side of the event. They point to Nevada as "ground zero" in the solar industry. They also suggest issues like energy efficiency, which as many as 30 states have embraced legislatively, tend to be bipartisan.

"It's easy to become jaded, living in D.C., about gridlock and the partisan nature of politics," said Alex Laskey, president of Opower, a software firm whose clients include utilities in nine countries. "There seems to be an interest in solving problems and a recognition that it's good for our economy. I'm hopeful that there will be kumbaya about efficiency."

The summit tends to attract Democratic-leaning voters, but it also appeals to some Republicans who see an upside to supporting the green economy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jon Huntsman, a former GOPpresidential candidate and Utah governor, will join a panel to discuss businesses' role in carbon reduction, as will MGM Resorts executive and Republican donor Jim Murren, another event cosponsor.

"There is a dimension of altruism to it," Murren said in a conference call on the event, according to the Las Vegas Review-Journal. "But we have learned this is good business sense. People will book conventions at Aria and Mandalay and Bellagio because they share the same core values as we do."

For Reid, the event builds on his reputation as a centrifugal force in Nevada politics. And it doesn't hurt that Nevada has become a key battleground in presidential contests.

"I've always looked at this event as a stage for Senator Reid on where he wants to move forward," Ball said. "Politics are involved in everything we do, but it's not Democratic Party-driven at all. It's very much Nevada-driven."

But it's more than just state politics. With the Democratic Senate majority on the line this cycle, and with speculation mounting that Reid may step aside despite saying he plans to run for his seat in 2016, the event serves as a tangible sign of the Searchlight native's influence.

"This is a legacy issue for Senator Reid," Manley said.

Wall Street Journal: "How the 2016 GOP Presidential Wannabes Spent the Summer"

By Gerald F. Seib

September 1, 2014, 6:28 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Republican Cast of Characters Are Sorting Themselves Into a Matrix of Categories

This Labor Day week marks the official start of the 2014 general-election season, so what's the logical thing to do? Look forward to the 2016 presidential election, of course.

OK, so that isn't entirely logical. But there is no doubt that the 2016 presidential race—which figures to be as wide open, unpredictable and flat-out interesting as any in memory—will be providing much of the background music for this year's congressional election, important as that contest is in its own right.

And at this early stage, the most intriguing presidential jockeying is unfolding on the Republican side. Whereas the early Democratic contest can be summarized in four simple words—is Hillary Clinton inevitable?—the Republican cast of characters has, over the course of the summer, sorted itself into a matrix of different categories defined by the potential candidates' varied circumstances and strategies.

There are, for example, two potential presidential wannabes who have emerged as the policy wonks in the crowd. They are Rep. Paul Ryan of Wisconsin and Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida.

The former, by dint of his position as chairman of the House Budget Committee, has written a blueprint for the kind of government he envisions, and, more recently, a new plan for how conservatives can fight poverty.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The latter, having washed his hands of his early emphasis on immigration reform, has delivered a series of speeches on policies foreign and domestic that would help fill up a policy binder in a presidential campaign.

Two of the party's elder statesmen, meanwhile, seem to be making it clear that they are available for a draft if party regulars clamor for them to run.

They are former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and, improbably enough, 2012 GOP nominee Mitt Romney.

Mr. Bush is the clear favorite of many in the party's establishment and money wings. But he doesn't look like a man who relishes the battles with movement conservatives that his candidacy would require, and may enter the fray only if it is clear establishment players commit to clearing a path for him.

Mr. Romney, meantime, says there is only a one in a million chance he will run again, but his busy travel schedule on behalf of Republican congressional candidates in recent weeks suggests he is open to persuasion.

Two other potential candidates are embarked on reclamation projects. One is New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, seeking to recover from the disastrous scandal over a traffic jam at a bridge created by his aides in a fit of pique. The other is Texas Gov. Rick Perry, seeking to recover from an equally disastrous 2012 presidential run.

Here's betting that both will conclude that their reclamation work has been successful enough to justify a run. Mr. Perry seems to be benefiting in the party from his recent indictment for trying to force out of office a Democratic prosecutor who has been a thorn in the Republicans' side.

One GOP contender stands out for trying to lay sole claim to the hard-right space, and that is Texas Sen. Ted Cruz. On the big three areas of policy debate—economic, social and national security—Mr. Cruz is making sure nobody gets to his right in his unabashed quest to be seen as rightful heir to Ronald Reagan.

Meanwhile, three other governors from around the country are forming a club of outsiders capable of running on an "I'm not from Washington" theme, a potentially lucrative approach at a time when views of Washington are scraping the bottom of the public-opinion barrel. They are Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal and Indiana Gov. Mike Pence.

Mr. Walker retains something approaching folk-hero status within the party for waging an epic battle against public-employee unions a few years ago. The question is whether the enmity he generated among other voters will undermine his bid for re-election this fall.

Neither Mr. Pence nor Mr. Jindal has to worry about re-election this year, so they are focusing on enacting conservative governing agendas within their states that could serve them well with Republican primary voters. Mr. Jindal did that most recently by taking on the Common Core educational standards that conservatives love to hate as an example of government overreach.

Two long-shots—former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, a social conservative, and Sen. Rob Portman, a budget wonk—are circling the runway, their intentions and prospects unclear.

Finally, there is a politician trying to carve an entirely new lane for himself in Republican politics: Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul. He is crafting a singular identity as a quasi-libertarian who nonetheless isn't an isolationist, who can appeal to young voters' hands-off views on social issues, and who reaches minority voters.

It's a tough act to pull off, and Mr. Paul's quirkiness scares many in the GOP.

Yet Scott Reed, a party activist who ran Bob Dole's 1996 presidential campaign, says Mr. Paul did more than anyone else to improve his position over the summer now drawing to a close.

New York Times: "Christie Studies Foreign Affairs for a 2016 Test"

By Michael Barbaro

September 1, 2014

A few days after Russian forces invaded Crimea, Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey was asked at a confidential meeting of Republican activists how he would have handled the situation differently from President Obama.

It was not, according to several of those in attendance, a tough or unexpected inquiry. But Mr. Christie, usually known for his oratorical sure-footedness, offered a wobbly reply, displaying little grasp of the facts and claiming that if he were in charge, Vladimir V. Putin, the Russian president, would know better than to mess with him.

According to an audio recording of the event, he said Mr. Putin had taken the measure of Mr. Obama. "I don't believe, given who I am, that he would make the same judgment," Mr. Christie said. "Let's leave it at that."

One attendee described Mr. Christie's answer as disturbingly heavy on swagger and light on substance. Another called it "uncomfortable to watch."

Now, as he considers a run for the presidency at a moment of spiraling global mayhem, Mr. Christie's trip to Mexico this week is taking on a sudden urgency. Intended as a trade mission, it will double as a chance to demonstrate a level of acumen on foreign policy that has so far eluded him.

Republican leaders are convinced that Mr. Obama's second-term foreign policy — guided by an instinctive reluctance to use force and the mantra "don't do stupid stuff" — has created an opening for a compelling Republican critique in 2016, and they are eager to find an authoritative statesman to deliver it.

The question for the party is whether Mr. Christie, whose political ascent was powered by a lacerating, undiplomatic personality, could be the right messenger.

Similar doubts about the international savvy of other potential Republican presidential candidates have prompted some to begin a crash course, seeking to catch up with the experience and prestige of a likely Democratic front-runner, former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton. For example, Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky just returned from a weeklong trip to Guatemala.

The job training has produced some stumbles. Gov. Rick Perry of Texas invited eye rolls from Pentagon officials when he declared it a "very real possibility" that fighters from the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria had come across the Mexican border and into the United States.

Busy with his day job and still enmeshed in a scandal about orchestrated traffic jams, Mr. Christie is, by his own admission, unschooled in the nuances of global affairs. He has already committed several foreign policy faux pas this year — by the unforgiving standards of Republican presidential politics, anyway.

They range from the minor (omitting the word "Israel" from a speech before an influential Jewish group) to the more meaningful (calling the West Bank the "occupied territories" before another influential Jewish group). Audible gasps ensued in a Las Vegas ballroom, and an apology from Mr. Christie soon followed.

"This is something the governor has struggled with, because it's so far outside his realm of experience," said Brigid Harrison, a professor of political science at Montclair State University in New Jersey who has studied Mr. Christie throughout his tenure.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“He is not,” she added, “a global guy.”

He is, however, trying to become one. This summer, Mr. Christie finished “Reagan at Reykjavik,” Ken Adelman’s history of the pivotal 1986 Cold War summit meeting. He has struck up a friendship with former Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, now an informal foreign policy tutor; is known to consult with former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger on major speeches that touch on world affairs; and is in contact with trusted Republican hands like Robert B. Zoellick, a career diplomat and former head of the World Bank.

After spending nearly three hours with Mr. Christie at the State House in July, spinning through the geopolitics of Asia, the economic future of Europe and the energy industry in Mexico, Mr. Zoellick described his pupil as “very quick.”

“Sometimes people will flag,” he said. “He didn’t at all. It could have gone on longer.”

Yet Mr. Christie’s tutorials appear less organized or far along than those of potential 2016 rivals like Mr. Paul or Representative Paul D. Ryan of Wisconsin, and Mr. Christie has yet to articulate a distinct vision of America’s place in the world that strays from his party’s typical expressions of dismay with Mr. Obama and tributes to Ronald Reagan.

Mr. Christie has been candid about the gaps in his international understanding. Pressed on them during an appearance in Chicago this year, Mr. Christie conceded, “I don’t have the briefings and the background to be able to say that I understand all the intricacies of it.”

The pillars of the Christie worldview, as gleaned from about a dozen speeches and public appearances, tend to rise from a simple observation: A high-functioning America at home, liberated from partisan dysfunction, exerts greater influence abroad.

“What we say and what we do here at home affects how others see us and in turn affects what it is they say and do,” Mr. Christie said during a speech at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Foundation in 2011.

He places tremendous value on the personal projection of authority, as evidenced by his suggestion — at the event held by conservative activists — that Mr. Putin would think twice about challenging him.

“Foreign policy, in my view, is about human relationships,” Mr. Christie said at the March conference held by the American Enterprise Institute at a resort in Georgia. The event was closed to the news media, but The New York Times was given access to a recording of Mr. Christie’s remarks.

“Men and women across the world judge each other,” Mr. Christie said at the time. “And they take a measure of the person based on your actions and your words.”

With Mr. Obama, he said mockingly, “words matter more to him than actions.”

“He’s in love with words,” he said. “He loves the words coming out of his mouth.”

At the event, Mr. Christie expressed confidence that his brand of resolute, no-nonsense foreign policy would have avoided the dilemma the United States faced when Syria deployed chemical weapons against its own citizens in the civil war.

Mr. Christie said he would have never drawn a “red line,” as Mr. Obama did with President Bashar al-Assad, but, “if you do, you better finish the job.”

Governors, whose duties entail little meaningful interaction with foreign governments, have always struggled to convey global know-how, or even familiarity with the names of foreign leaders. But for a variety of reasons, mastery of foreign relations is likely to become a bigger-than-usual yardstick in the 2016 Republican presidential contest.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There is a determination within the party to avoid repeating mistakes of the 2012 primary season, when the unwieldy field of candidates displayed an occasionally embarrassing lack of international knowledge. (Herman Cain declared that it was immaterial which leader ran “Ubeki-beki-beki-beki-stan-stan.”) By Election Day, polls showed that Mr. Obama was far more trusted on foreign policy than the Republican nominee, Mitt Romney.

And there is the Clinton factor.

Republican operatives said Mr. Christie had time to catch up, and they pointed to the models of Mr. Romney and George W. Bush, two state chief executives who committed themselves, early on in their governorships, to the rigorous study of global affairs. Mr. Romney invited specialists like Frederick W. Kagan, a former military historian at West Point, to brief him in Boston, and he studied custom-made booklets with the names of world leaders. Mr. Bush held Sunday night conference calls with a team of advisers nicknamed the Vulcans, including Ms. Rice, Stephen J. Hadley and Paul D. Wolfowitz.

“My view is that he’ll have work to do, but he’s up to the task,” said Arthur C. Brooks, the president of the American Enterprise Institute, who was interviewing Mr. Christie at the event in Georgia when the governor talked about Crimea. (Mr. Brooks declined to comment on the exchange.)

Ari Fleischer, Mr. Bush’s former press secretary, said there was a narrow window for a candidate like Mr. Christie to immerse himself in the subject, before the rigors of a campaign begin.

“It becomes essential,” Mr. Fleischer said. “If you make a mistake, particularly later in 2015, and certainly in 2016, it will become magnified way beyond the mistake itself.

“This is the time to do it,” he said.

The Hill blog: Briefing Room: “Sanders calls for agenda 'for all Americans'”

By Martin Matishak

September 1, 2014, 5:10 p.m. EDT

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) said that the U.S. needs an economic plan that benefits “not just the very rich," but all Americans.

“The sad reality of today's America is that while the wealthiest people and largest corporations are doing phenomenally well, the middle class is disappearing and millions of Americans are working longer hours for lower wages,” Sanders said in a statement commemorating Labor Day.

“Congress must start listening to the needs of ordinary Americans, not just the billionaire class and their lobbyists,” he said.

Sanders, an independent who caucuses with Senate Democrats, is considering challenging Clinton in the hopes of taking advantage of fears among party members that she is too close for comfort with Wall Street.

To that end, he spoke at an AFL-CIO breakfast hosted in Manchester, N.H., on Monday and intends to trek to Iowa in mid-September, at the same time Hillary Clinton will be there attending a steak fry hosted by retiring Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa).

Sanders said the U.S. could create “millions of new jobs by rebuilding our crumbling infrastructure and dramatically improve life for low-wage workers by raising the minimum wage,” popular issues among Democratic base voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He called for trade policies that would “prevent corporations from throwing American workers out on the street and running to China for cheap labor" and tax reform so that businesses "can't stash their profits in foreign tax havens.”

Sanders also urged his colleagues to pass “real campaign finance reform so that the Koch brothers and other billionaires are no longer able to buy elections.”

New York Times column: Frank Bruni: “Obama’s Messy Words”

By Frank Bruni

September 1, 2014

There are things that you think and things that you say.

There’s what you reckon with privately and what you utter publicly.

There are discussions suitable for a lecture hall and those that befit the bully pulpit.

These sets overlap but aren’t the same. Has President Obama lost sight of that?

It’s a question fairly asked after his statement last week that “we don’t have a strategy yet” for dealing with Islamic extremists in Syria. Not having a strategy, at least a fixed, definitive one, is understandable. The options aren’t great, the answers aren’t easy and the stakes are enormous.

But announcing as much? It’s hard to see any percentage in that. It gives no comfort to Americans. It puts no fear in our enemies.

Just as curious was what Obama followed that up with.

Speaking at a fund-raiser on Friday, he told donors, “If you watch the nightly news, it feels like the world is falling apart.” He had that much right.

But it wasn’t the whole of his message. In a statement of the obvious, he also said, “The world has always been messy.” And he coupled that with a needless comparison, advising Americans to bear in mind that the rise of the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria, the rapacity of Putin, the bedlam in Libya and the rest of it were “not something that is comparable to the challenges we faced during the Cold War.”

Set aside the question of how germane the example of the Cold War is. When the gut-twisting image stuck in your head is of a masked madman holding a crude knife to the neck of an American on his knees in the desert, when you’re reading about crucifixions in the 21st century, when you’re hearing about women sold by jihadists as sex slaves, and when British leaders have just raised the threat level in their country to “severe,” the last thing that you want to be told is that it’s par for the historical course, all a matter of perspective and not so cosmically dire.

Where’s the reassurance — or the sense of urgency — in that?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And maybe the second-to-last thing that you want to be told is that technology and social media amplify peril in a new way and may be the reason you're feeling especially on edge. Obama said something along those lines, too. It's not the terror, folks. It's the tweets.

Is the president consoling us — or himself? It's as if he's taken his interior monologue and wired it to speakers in the town square. And it's rattling.

When he came along, many of us were fed up with misinformation and "Mission Accomplished" theatrics and bluster. America had paid a price for them in young lives.

And we were tired and leery of an oversimplified, Hollywood version of world affairs, of the Manichaean lexicon of "evil empire" and "axis of evil." We longed for something less rash and more nuanced.

But there's plenty of territory between the bloated and bellicose rhetoric of then and what Obama is giving us now. He's adopted a strange language of self-effacement, with notes of defeatism, reminding us that "America, as the most powerful country on earth, still does not control everything"; that we must be content at times with singles and doubles in lieu of home runs; that not doing stupid stuff is its own accomplishment.

This is all true. It's in tune with our awareness of our limits. And it reflects a prudent disinclination to repeat past mistakes and overreach.

But that doesn't make it the right message for the world's lone superpower (whether we like it or not) to articulate and disseminate. That doesn't make it savvy, constructive P.R. And the low marks that Americans currently give the president, especially for foreign policy, suggest that it's not exactly what we were after.

In The Washington Post on Sunday, Karen DeYoung and Dan Balz observed that while Obama's no-strategy remark "may have had the virtue of candor," it in no way projected "an image of presidential resolve or decisiveness at a time of international turmoil."

And no matter what Obama ultimately elects to do, such an image is vital. But in its place are oratorical shrugs and an aura of hesitancy, even evasion, as he and John Kerry broadcast that the United States shouldn't be expected to act on its own. Isn't that better whispered to our allies and negotiated behind closed doors?

Echoing Hillary Clinton to some degree, Senator Dianne Feinstein just complained that Obama was perhaps "too cautious."

Not in what he says, he's not. Not when he draws and then erases red lines. Not with his recent adjectives.

"Messy" is my kitchen at the end of a long weekend. What's happening in much of Syria and Iraq is monstrous.

CRACKED CHINA

THE STORY

China's economy has been taking a lot of sick days this summer. And now, global markets are getting the bug .

EXPLAIN.

Earlier this month, the Chinese government tried to boost the country's meh economy by letting the value of the yuan slide. The goal: to make Chinese goods cheaper and encourage people to spend. The problem: it makes products from other countries (cough, the US, cough) more expensive for Chinese people and companies to buy. This policy change, plus a messy summer for China's stock market , plus some other international headaches (lookin' at you, Greece), equals global investors reaching for the Alka-Seltzer.

DAMN.

Yup. Last week, after some bad economic data from China, global stock markets completely freaked out. US markets ended up with their worst losses in four years. And today isn't looking any better. China's markets opened even weaker than yesterday, which has triggered a global domino effect . Think: Asian and European markets taking tumbles and oil prices way down.

ANYTHING ELSE?

The markets' tantrum comes as everybody's favorite central bankers at the Fed have been deciding when to raise interest rates. The Fed has been keeping them near zero since the financial crisis, with the thinking that if it's cheap for consumers to borrow money they'll do things like buy a house and give the economy a lil' boost. But the bank is about ready for hand-holding to be over. It was considering raising rates at a meeting next month – but thanks to China, that may be on pause.

theSKIMM

Right now, the ups and downs of global markets are hinging on two of the least transparent things ever: the Chinese government and the Federal Reserve.

WHAT PEOPLE ARE TALKING ABOUT...

These three Americans . On Friday, three Americans — two of them off-duty military service members — took down a heavily armed gunman on a train going from Amsterdam to Paris. The three men and a British passenger tackled the suspect – who was carrying an AK47 and lots of ammo – b efore he could do anything. The suspect is a 26-year-old Moroccan man. European officials think he may have terror ties. But yesterday, his lawyer said he was just trying to rob people on the train. Which made everything all better.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOU SPRINT ONTO THE SUBWAY RIGHT BEFORE THE DOORS CLOSE...

Just call me Usain Bolt . Yesterday, at the World Championships in Beijing, the Jamaican sprinter reaffirmed for everyone that yes, he is the fastest man alive. He ran 100 meters in the time it took you to read this sentence, otherwise known as 9.79 seconds. Bolt beat American Justin Gatlin (who's been dealing with ongoing doping allegations) by one-hundredth of a second. The two will face off again at the 2016 Olympics in Rio. WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOUR NEIGHBOR PLAYS LOUD MUSIC...

Hate you. Things between South Korea and North Korea are going swimmingly again. Over the weekend, the not-so-friendly neighbors met to talk things out for the zillionth time. The two countries have technically been at war since the 1950s, and have passed the time with things like threatening all-out war and doing nuclear tests. The drama kicked up again earlier this month when North Korea was blamed for planting land mines that injured two South Korean soldiers. In response, South Korea took the high ground by spreading anti-North haterade. Over a loud speaker system. Like adults. Along the border it shares with North Korea. Which resulted in the two countries firing some shots (actual ones) at each other last week. The talks over the weekend were supposed to help them work it out. But that didn't exactly happen . South Korea said the loud speaker stunt won't end until North Korea apologizes for the land mines. And then they stuck their tongues out at each other.

This is the hack that never ends. Last month, the website was hacked. Last week, love was in the air when the personal information of about 39 million users who created accounts on the "Life is short. Have an affair" site were posted online for the world to judge. CC: Josh Duggar and more than 10,000 government employees. Yesterday, two Canadian law firms decided all was not fair in love and cheating and filed a $578 million class-action lawsuit against the companies that run the website. And more good news, remember that Christian blogger whose videos surprising his wife about her pregnancy, and then sharing their miscarriage, went viral? Over the weekend, he admitted to having an account on the site . His wife said she forgives him. Safe to say not all spouses took the news that well.

SKIMM THIS

ONE THING TO KNOW

Mei Xiang : The name of the giant panda you've been seeing around all weekend. She surprised everyone at her home – the National Zoo – by giving birth to twins. Giant pandas are an endangered species, so the two-for-one special is big news in the animal world.

Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 06/24/08

Main Topics: Charlie Black Comments, Tim Pawlenty

Summary of Shift: Charlie Black and his comments about a terrorist attack aiding McCain politically led the day. Even Mr. Black couldn't push oil and energy off center stage; coverage of offshore drilling and the gas tax holiday were heavy. Another levee broke worsening conditions and forcing more evacuations throughout the Midwest and lightning fires continue in California. Zimbabwe remains in turmoil as Mugabe tries to retain control and his opponent flees. French President Sarkozy was rushed out of Israel after a suicide bomber struck near Tel Aviv airport. Violence in Iraq spiked with attacks in Sadr city killing four Americans. Discussion on whether Don Imus's recent comments were racist or not was also prevalent.

Black May Be Right but his Position as McCain Advisor Makes Comments Unacceptable (CBS 06/24/08 7:13am)
HENRY SMITH: Senator John McCain disavowed controversial remarks from a top advisor in which the aide remarked that a terror attack would politically beneficial to John McCain . . .explain who Charlie Black is . . .

JEFF GREENFIELD: Charlie Black is a veteran Republican political operative for decades . . . signed on as an unpaid political advisor to McCain . . . so he's a key play in the McCain campaign.

[. . .]

GREENFIELD: The reaction was, I think the Obama campaign called it a disgrace, he apologized . . . John McCain said, if that's what he meant, I really disavow it. All of which ignores the question, well on the merits as a political piece of analysis, of course it would be and everyone knows that, John McCain's strength is national security, he's the tough guy. It's like the reverse of Voltaire who once said, "If I disagree with what you say but I'll defend to the death your right to say it." In this case I probably agree with what Charlie Black said but I disagree with his ability to say it as a

GREENFIELD: . . . last Dec. 28th he actually said, yeah it might help me . . . it went without a ripple.

Andrea Mitchell Covers Black Back and Forth (MSNBC 06/24/08 7:31am)
ANDREA MITCHELL: His advisor has apologized but it is a controversy. The top strategist was already in the spotlight for past lobbying work. Now he's under fire for suggesting that John McCain would benefit from another 9/11 style attack . . . McCain quickly rejected those sentiments.

JOHN MCCAIN: I can't imagine why he would say it. It's not true. It's, uh, I've worked tirelessly since 9/11 to prevent another attack on the United States of America.

MITCHELL: Black apologized but it was an example of another unexpected turn in this volatile campaign. John McCain is lashing out at Obama for not keeping his word about appearing with McCain at joint town hall meetings.

MCCAIN: When he was asked about it originally he said, "Anywhere, anytime." Well, I hoped that he would stick to that commitment. Which obviously he has not done.

MITCHELL: Another example, says McCain, is Obama's reversal on public financing.

MCCAIN: What bothers me is how the American going to have trust and confidence in the commitments we make to them . . .

Charlie Black Terrorist Attack Comments Scrutinized (ABC, 6/24/08, 7:06am)
ROBIN ATIN: Back to Campaign 08 and those controversial comments made by McCain's chief campaign strategist. He said a terrorist attack would be a big advantage for John McCain's presidential bid. […]

JAKE TAPPER: […] Well, Navy pilot and former Vietnam P.O.W. John McCain often discusses national security. According to polls it's one of the few issues that more Americans trust John McCain to handle it than trust Barack Obama. But as one of McCain's top aids learned first hand, discussing national security issues, especially terrorism, requires a degree of sensitivity. Top McCain aid, Charlie Black, tells fortune magazine in a new story that the December assassination of former Pakistani leader Benazir Bhutto helped McCain's campaign by re-emphasizing his commander and chief credentials. Black then said of a future terrorist attack on U.S. soil quote, "Certainly it would be a big advantage to McCain as well in the November election."

MICHAEL O'HANLON: Certainly Charlie Black can make the argument he did and he's got reasonable grounds to do it, but it seemed to callous like he was looking for political benefit about something for it to happen would have terrible human cost.

TAPPER: McCain immediately distanced himself from the campaign miscalculation.

JOHN MCCAIN: I can't imagine why he would say it, it's not true.

TAPPER: In a later statement, Black called his comments "inappropriate" and said he regrets them. But the Obama campaign pounced, saying the remarks were "a complete disgrace." Feeding into what Obama calls quote, "the Bush-Cheney political book of fear."

BARACK OBAMA: We know what kind of campaign they're going to run. They're going to try to make you afraid.

TAPPER: McCain and Obama were squaring off over national security just a few days ago, over whether alleged terrorists detainees should be given certain rights. Obama said yes, McCain said no.

MCCAIN: He doesn't have an understanding of the nature of the threat. And I'll look forward to that debate quite often in the future.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

TAPPER: Obama's pushback, the war in Iraq he says has weakened the war on terror.

OBAMA: In part because of their failed strategies, we got Bin Laden still sending out audio tapes.

TAPPER: You might remember Senator Clinton last August, campaigning in N.H., made a similar remark saying that a terrorist attack could benefit the republican nominee. She was attacked by her fellow democrats for her quote, " tasteless political calculation."

McCain Campaign "Tearing Their Hair Out" Over Charlie Black Comments (ABC, 06/24/08, 7:16am)
ROBIN ATIN: Alright George, almost immediately we had apologies from McCain and Charlie Black. But is this the kind of thing that a campaign puts out there on purpose and then retracts?

GEORGE STEPHANOPOLIS: No way, not on this one Robin. In fact, the McCain campaign is tearing their hair out over this this morning. Now it is true, as Jake pointed out in his piece, that the fight against Al Qaeda is one of the clear issues where John McCain has an advantage. A clear advantage over Senator Obama. But a lot of observers, democrats and republicans alike, agree that a terrorist attack could end of benefiting John McCain. But this is the kind of thing you just can't say, it's too crude, it's too insensitive. And the bigger problem for the McCain campaign right now is that they can't seem to avoid what one aid called these unforced errors. They were trying to drive home a message on energy policy yesterday, this got in the way, this clouded it. They're trying to tighten control of the message to stop these unforced errors but they haven't been able to do it yet.

Frustration in McCain Campaign Over Black Comments Palpable, But No Signs of Him Leaving Campaign (CNN, 06/24/08, 8:33am)

DANA BASH: […] The frustration inside the McCain Campaign was really palpable because they felt like they had finally, yesterday, they had a message when it comes to energy. The issue they understand that voters care most about. A headline grabbing idea and it really got muddled big time by what happened with Charlie Black.

JOHN ROBERTS: Dana, some calls by the opposition for McCain to throw Charlie Black overboard. I assume he's not going to do that?

BASH: At this point it doesn't look that way at all. I mean Black is somebody that has been a trusted advisor to McCain for a very very long time. They've known each other for 30 years. And because, I think they feel inside the campaign, because he understood very quickly that this is something that he had to correct fast, and he did so, that they hope that this can get blown over. Having said that, democrats are not going to let this go. You saw all of these statements by democrats yesterday calling this a disgrace. They're going to keep pushing this.

Pawlenty Responds to Black Comments, Says Gas Tax Holiday not a Gimmick (MSNBC 06/24/08 8.19am)
MIKE BARNICLE: This is Mike Barnicle, I was wondering, you just mentioned Senator McCain's energy policy. What is his energy policy with regard to the facts that people are paying $4.30 for gasoline per gallon right now today.

PAWLENTY: Unlike Barack Obama, he is for a holiday on gas taxes . . . He wants to transition us as radically and quickly as possible to non-petroleum based cars, that's why he's offered this $300 million incentive, also wants to give a $5,000 per car tax credit for the first manufacturers who can put out zero emission cars for everybody who buys one or sells one. He also wants to drill off-shore so we can increase domestic production . . . he wants to increase nuclear energy. Barack Obama is against all these things. John McCain does not want to increase taxes on energy . . .

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: But governor, some striking contrasts within John McCain's energy policy. The one that you just listed, starting with the gas tax. Why would you put out a gas tax holiday, basically inspiring people to drive more? Why would you go there? That sounds to me like such a gimmick and a gimmick, quite frankly, to buy votes.

PAWLENTY: Well, it's near-term relief and if you go out and talk to truckers who are spending great deals of money just to keep their trucks on the road or people who are commuting to and front work, it may seem like something that's temporary, but it's temporary relief to people that are hurting.

BRZEZINSKI: But we are talking about energy policy. Talking about trying to get rid of our dependence on foreign oil. We're trying to figure out a solution. Not prolong it or promulgate the problem.

PAWLENTY: Yes, Mika but that's, that holiday is only one small piece of a comprehensive plan . . . so in the meantime, Sen. McCain has near term ideas and strategies as well and the holiday is one of those.

PAT BUCHANAN: . . . let me talk about one of those near-term strategies, and, quote, Senator McCain: "I further propose we inspire the ingenuity and resolve of the American people by offering a $300 million prize for development of a battery . . . this is $1 for every American." It suggests that only Americans can compete for this 300 million prize when the Japanese are five years ahead of us in developing these batteries. If the Japanese . . . group came together and produced this new battery that Senator McCain and the world wants, would the Japanese be eligible for the prize?

PAWLENTY: I don't know that that's been asked an answered directly by Senator McCain. But I think the . . . the intent is to incentivize American ingenuity and innovation. And by the way, don't assume the Japanese are ahead of us. . .

BRZEZINSKI: Governor, I have a question for you. I take it you are aware of this, I would say low-level controversy over statements made by Charlie Black that he then apologized for. How would you advise Senator McCain to deal with that?

PAWLENTY: Well, first of all, Charlie has apologized for the comments and Senator McCain has said he strenuously disagrees with them. So I think that's a proper response to the comments. But more importantly, I think Charlie was, I suspect, just trying to emphasize that Senator McCain rightly and understandably is viewed as the stronger candidate when it comes to national security and military affairs and on international matters and that's a function of his record and a function of the facts. But the way that Charlie said that he has acknowledged was inappropriate and Senator McCain concurred.

BARNICLE: Do you think it was inappropriate, governor? And what was inappropriate about it?

PAWNLENTY: Well, I think Charlie indicated that, you know, suggesting that any particular political candidate could benefit from a tragedy, particularly a horrific terrorist attack and tying those two things together is inappropriate and that's obvious and Charlie has acknowledged that and Senator McCain has as well. But the point he was trying to make indirectly is Senator McCain has a stronger outlook on those issues.

BUCHANAN: Governor, even the late primaries, Senator McCain had locked up the nomination, everybody had been out, Ron Paul and Gov. Huckabee were winning 25% of the Republican vote in Pennsylvania. Do you think John McCain has solved what many people believe was one of his problems energizing the conservative base and energizing the evangelical base of the Republican Party?

PAWLAENTY: Well, pat, at least as measured by the polls of the percent of Republicans or Conservatives that are supporting Senator McCain, that level of support that he is receiving is as high or higher than comparable Republican Presidential candidates at this point in the campaign. So I think the answer to your question is yes, but you also asked about energizing them and I think you will see that momentum pick up over the summer and fall as well. Not just getting their support, also energizing them as you said.

Gov. Tim Pawlenty Talks McCain's Energy Policies and Comments on Charlie Black Controversy (FNC, 06/24/08, 7:58am)
STEVE DOOCY: Governor let me ask about this. Over the last couple of weeks the senator from Arizona has changes his stand on offshore drilling. Now he is for it. And now a number of democrats are saying, well look at that, John McCain is a flip-flopper. Sure, Barack Obama said he was for campaign financing from the public before he was against it. But John McCain is flipping on oil drilling offshore. What do you say to that?

TIM PAWLENTY: Well, to be fair, I think John McCain has spoken in the past about offshore drilling, if the states allowed it or gave permission, which is what he's proposed here now. You have a situation where John McCain is for reducing gas taxes for temporary relief. Barack Obama's against that. John McCain's for nuclear energy, Barack Obama is against that. John McCain is for drilling now to create more supply, and we need it, look at these gas prices. Barack Obama is against that. John McCain is for not increasing taxes on energy, Barack Obama has been for increasing taxes. So there's big contrast here, John McCain sees the need to increase supply, Barack Obama has sort of a do-nothing or minimalist approach, and that's not going to work, we have a big crisis in this country, and John McCain I think in terms of this offshore drilling issue has said in the past that he would look at it if states were involved and that's what he's proposed.

DOOCY: One more thing before you go, I wanted to ask you about something that Charlie Black, one of John McCain's senior advisors said. He said that a terrorist attack on the United States would be a big advantage to John McCain because it has to do with national security. Of course Barack Obama's campaign has said that is completely inappropriate and an awful thing to say. Just curious, your perspective?

PAWLENTY: Well Charlie's apologized for the comment, and John McCain has said he doesn't like the comment, he doesn't agree with it. I think Charlie was probably just trying to reflect that John McCain is viewed as in fact has stronger national security has stronger international affairs credentials than Barack Obama. But he's acknowledged the statement was inappropriate.

Straight Talk Express Derailed, McCain Criticized For Many Flip-Flops (CNN, 06/24/08, 7:54am)

JOHN ROBERTS: What about John McCain, has he done some flip-flops as well?

JOAN VENNOCHI: Well John McCain, the Straight-Talk Express, which existed in the year 2000, has been derailed. It's really been derailed. For example, on offshore oil drilling. In 2000 he believed in a moratorium on offshore drilling, now he's saying let the states decide, as gas prices edge up and he's looking to get that vote.

ROBERTS: What about tax cuts?

VENNOCHI: Well, again on tax cuts, I mean John McCain, as a matter of conscious he voted against the Bush tax cuts. Now he's saying that the tax cuts should be permanent. So you know, another big derailment of the Straight Talk Express.
ROBERTS: And also immigration reform you pointed out in your column.

VENNOCHI: On McCain and immigration reform, my goodness, I mean he and Ted Kennedy championed comprehensive immigration reform. It called for a guest worker pass and a path to citizenship. In a debate on January 30th, John McCain actually said he would vote against his own plan. That's a pretty big flip-flop I'd say.

New MoveOn.org Ad Criticized For Being Deeply Dishonest (FNC, 06/24/08, 7:20am)
STEVE DOOCY: A new ad by MoveOn.org attacking John McCain's policy on the War in Iraq. […]

[MoveOn.org Ad shown]

DOOCY: […] You don't like that ad why?

BILL KRISTOL: No I think it's deeply dishonest. I mean, John McCain doesn't want little Alex. Of course it's up to Alex to decide whether he wants to volunteer for the military in 18 years. John McCain will long since cease to be president at that point, it's not up to his mommy to decide if he's going to serve or not. But it makes it seem as if we have a draft, and it makes it seem, more importantly, it's such a selfish ad, I mean it's really an attempt to play on parents heart strings, but really in a disgraceful way. If MoveOn.org wants to say the war in Iraq is a mistake, John McCain's policies are wrong, they're entitled to say that. But the notion that John McCain is going to come snatch kids out of their mother's arms and send them to war in Iraq in 18 years is, of course, ludicrous. And I'm very shocked, in the New York Times the other day, the head of MoveOn.org has a letter objecting to my column, which cheered me up. And I think with my column, maybe I hit a little nerve. And his letter does not really defend the ad, it just attacks McCain's Iraq policy. There's something really bad about turning our political discourse into a kind of emotional, mothers protecting their little babies from John McCain type of discourse.

GRETCHEN CARLSON: There's a sense of elitism, because they're implying in this ad that someone's going to have to take care of this, but it's not going to be this child.

KRISTOL: You know, it's interesting what you say Gretchen, MoveOn claim on their website that this is their most effective ad ever. And maybe it is, maybe it really does hit people, but if you don't think much about it you don't realize how deeply deeply dishonest it is. And I think, it turns our soldiers into kind of babies in a sense. You know, mommy does not volunteer young Alex, young John, Mary for the military in our country. And we should honor and respect those who have chosen to serve. This ad really conveys the impression that the only people who might go into the military are people who foolishly get seduced in. It really shows a disdain and contempt for the military. For those that have served, for parents who might be proud of their children who have chosen to serve.

KRISTOL: It's a phony issue. John McCain has always been for the volunteer army. Barack Obama's for the volunteer army. We don't need a draft, we need to increase the size of our army and marines a bit. And both candidates afford that sentiment. […]

CARLSON: […] The implication is, if you vote for John McCain's he's going to institute a draft.

KRISTOL: Right, so let them make that argument instead of implying it in a dishonest way. It's not true.

Burgess Defends McCain's Health Care Plan (MSNBC 06/24/08 9:35am)
CONTESSA BREWER: Barack Obama is promising. . . access to health insurance for every American. Will John McCain's plan do the same?

MICHAEL BURGESS: Well I think John McCain's plan comes a lot closer to the ideal goal . . .

BREWER: If you're looking at the five thousand dollars in tax credits, a lot of people who can't afford health insurance, that $5000 tax credit might not mean anything to them because they're probably not even paying that much in taxes . . . if you're looking at employers, an average of $12,000 a year to insure a family of four. How does 5000 bucks in tax credits going help?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BURGESS: . . . first . . . the employer who provides $12,000 a year in health insurance. They . . . would be able to provide additional compensation to that employee . . . the other aspect is that if someone doesn't make enough money to pay taxes in the first place, remember this is an advancable, prefundable tax credit . . .

BREWER: . . . how does John McCain plan to pay for this?

BURGESS: Well, the offset mechanism, what is now occurring in the employer based system, the amount of money that is off the table for taxes, the amount of money that is spent over and above that $5000 tax credit, that is part of the payment. The reality is that a lot of these details are being worked out in different economic models . . . this will be a fully vetted and complete plan the day that John McCain takes office . . .

Subject: FW: Did you see this?

John & Mary,

I'm hoping you had a chance to read my note a few days ago. We are just hours away from our quarterly reporting deadline. We need 25 more grassroots contributions to hit our goal. Can you chip in $5 or more by midnight to help us reach our goal?

Thank you for all that you do.

John Garamendi

Dear John & Mary,

Friday at the Sacramento Airport, as Patti and I got off the plane, we were stopped by a fellow passenger. "Congressman, I just want to thank you for SB 250, your 1982 law that established the Emergency Medical System for California. It has worked for 33 years. I'm the Deputy Director and we save lives every minute. Thank you for your vision."

Wow! What a wonderful way to complete a week of reflection set in motion by the Pope's visit to Washington and the Congress. Yes, reflecting on my public policy work is satisfying. It's a good journey and I always look to tomorrow's challenges.

The list of issues is long and in every way affects all humanity today and future generations as well. Next week I will engage our European allies in a discussion of nuclear weapons. I'm deeply troubled by the restart of a nuclear arms race involving the United States, Russia, United Kingdom, France and China. America will spend over $1Trillion dollars in the next 25 years rebuilding our nuclear bombs and fielding new stealth bombers, missiles, submarines, satellites, and defensive systems. One trillion dollars of your tax money will not be spent on education, infrastructure, healthcare and so many more important issues here at home and abroad, but rather on creating a far more dangerous world.

In Congress we must debate and act on Climate change, challenging our Republican Colleagues to honor the Pope's message on this threat to future generations. We must seek creative ways to revitalize our economy, preserve environmental resources, and create new opportunities for people to receive an affordable education, and a good middle class job. In Congress, I have worked across the aisle to secure emergency fire and drought funding, to fight for American jobs with my Make it in America bills, and to promote diplomacy and peacebuilding.

In this journey I have not been alone. Patti has always been at my side for every step and every issue, and you are there too with advice, financial support and a good word of encouragement.

Yes, it is a good journey, and part of that journey is the never-ending necessity to raise money for the next election, which is just 10 months away. We are quickly approaching the September 30th quarterly reporting deadline, and my campaign needs your support. If you pitch in $25, $50 or $100 to my campaign, we can continue to address pressing issues facing our nation.

I am passionate about investing in American families to ensure prosperity for generations to come. That is why I will be seeking reelection in 2016. Your support throughout the years has been critical to my success, and I hope I can count on you to stand with me in the coming months. You can help by making a contribution here. Big or small, it all counts, so please click here and send what you can.

Thank you for your support,

Summary: WJC opened with explanation of what he believes the election is about, namely broadly shared prosperty and how to keep US safe while maintaining our values. He noted that experts have praised HRC's Wall Street plan as the most comprehensive. WJC gave extraordinarily warm and personal comments about HRC as a person, saying he fell in love with her because she was the most amazing person and that "everything she touched, she made better." This came after a long explanation of her young life and career when she was working for the Children's Defense Fund.

The item from his speech that garnered the most attention was a comment he made on Tom DeLay and Ted Cruz. He called DeLay the pre-tea party Ted Cruz and said HRC's accomplishment of agreement with him on foster care reforms in the 1990s was perhaps a bigger deal than her getting China and Russia to agree to Iran sanctions.

Andrea Mitchell caught him on the rope line and asked about Trump:

John,

I listened in on the AIPAC call today. It was a call to arms. AIPAC views this as one of the most important lobbying efforts in its history. In addition to normal lobbying efforts they are collaborating with Citizens for a Nuclear Free Iran to run TV ads and are embarking on a fundraising campaign around this issue. I wanted you to know this so that HRC and her advisors knew this in advance of her staking a position. Personally, I'm opposed to the Iran Deal as I understand it but am prepared to more deeply understand it before making a final determination. I fear that this will become a polarizing issues for the Pro-Israel community and it will be important for HRC to fully consider all aspects of this policy issue before taking a public stance. Her stance to date in my view has been very appropriate. The landscape has now changed and people will be closely examining her every word. Moreover, the republicans' will use this to energize Pro-Israel supporters and donors. When I meet with her in April I shared that I was surprised at the number of people in the Baltimore Jewish Community questioning her stance on Israel. I attempted to persuade them differently but she is suffering to some degree from guilt by association. This could be a defining moment.

Let me know if i can be helpful to you in any way.

Michael

AIPAC America's Pro-Israel Lobby

As promised in my letter to you yesterday, AIPAC's policy experts have carefully reviewed the entire proposed nuclear agreement with Iran, including all of its annexes. Following our detailed assessment, we have come to the unfortunate conclusion that this agreement does not achieve the minimum requirements necessary for an acceptable deal.

AIPAC admires the determined efforts by America's negotiating team over the past many months, and we remain committed to a successful diplomatic process to bring about an end to Iran's nuclear weapons quest. As we have said since the negotiations began in 2013, diplomacy offers the best path to peacefully resolving the Iranian nuclear issue. Regrettably, however, the deal presented yesterday in Vienna falls short of its intentions to make the United States, Israel and our allies safer. In fact, we believe this agreement will do the opposite.

We can, and we must, do better.

Over the next 60 days, AIPAC will focus on one goal: engaging and convincing members of the House and Senate to oppose this deal and ultimately seek a better one.

A congressional rejection of this bad agreement will require the passion and political activism of every single member of our movement. This effort will demand unprecedented resources, energy and focus to engage our representatives in Washington and to articulate the grave consequences of accepting this deal.

Please take action today by contacting your members of Congress and urging them to oppose this unacceptable agreement.

AIPAC published a press release moments ago, which further explains our position and details our concerns with the proposed deal. Please read this statement (included below) and share it broadly with those in your community. In addition, please take a look at this fact sheet highlighting six unacceptable consequences of the proposed agreement.

I am proud to stand with you and with AIPAC as we meet this challenge together and work to safeguard our future.

Thank you for all that you are about to do.

Sincerely,

Robert A. Cohen
AIPAC President

AIPAC Statement on Proposed Iran Nuclear Agreement

AIPAC has consistently supported diplomatic efforts to end Iran's nuclear weapons program, and we appreciate the commitment and dedication of President Obama and his administration throughout these negotiations. Unfortunately, this proposed agreement fails to halt Iran's nuclear quest. Instead, it would facilitate rather than prevent Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon and would further entrench and empower the leading state sponsor of terror.

During these negotiations, we outlined criteria for a good deal that Congress itself had set in five critical areas: inspections, possible military dimensions, sanctions, duration and dismantlement. In each of these areas, the proposed agreement has significant flaws:

- The proposed deal does not ensure "anytime, anywhere" short-notice inspections;

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- The proposed deal does not clearly condition sanctions relief on full Iranian cooperation in satisfying International Atomic Energy Agency concerns over the possible military dimensions of Tehran's program;

- The proposed deal lifts sanctions as soon as the agreement commences, rather than gradually as Iran demonstrates sustained adherence to the agreement;

- The proposed deal lifts key restrictions in as few as eight years;

- The proposed deal would disconnect and store centrifuges in an easily reversible manner, but it requires no dismantlement of centrifuges or any Iranian nuclear facility;

- In return for this flawed agreement, Iran will receive over $100 billion in sanctions relief. Tehran will use these funds to fuel its hegemonic ambitions, support the killing of civilians in Syria, fund the terrorist organizations Hamas and Hezbollah, and spur deadly conflicts throughout the region.

This agreement not only fails to achieve its objectives in the nuclear arena, but it releases Tehran in a matter of years — regardless of Iranian behavior — from ballistic missile sanctions and an arms embargo imposed by the United Nations Security Council. This late, unexpected concession will provide additional arms for terrorism and proxy wars, while strengthening Iran's capabilities against our regional allies.

This accord threatens the future of the nuclear non-proliferation regime. By leaving Iran on the threshold of a nuclear weapon — despite its history of violating international obligations — other countries in the region will have a dangerous incentive to initiate their own nuclear programs. The resulting nuclear arms race would severely destabilize the region.

Proponents of the proposed agreement will argue that the only alternative to this agreement is military conflict. In fact, the reverse is true. A bad agreement such as this will invite instability and nuclear proliferation. It will embolden Iran and may encourage regional conflict.

We strongly believe that the alternative to this bad deal is a better deal. Congress should reject this agreement, and urge the administration to work with our allies to maintain economic pressure on Iran while offering to negotiate a better deal that will truly close off all Iranian paths to a nuclear weapon.

Congress should insist on a better deal.

STANDING UP FOR MICHIGAN

John D. –

As Michiganders, we know what a precious resource the Great Lakes are. They are central to our Michigan way of life and they provide billions of dollars annual in economic activity.

Right now, the Great Lakes are at risk: Canada is proposing to permanently store millions of gallons of nuclear waste less than a mile from the shores of Lake Huron. The proposal puts the drinking water of over 40 million people at risk, as well as endangering our economy.

We've been fighting this proposed plan, but we need your help.

Sign with us today if you believe the Great Lakes are too important to go ahead with this risky plan.

This plan could have long-term negative effects on the health, jobs, and quality of life of Michigan residents.

Thank you for standing with us and our Great Lakes,

Dear Jake,

I am sure everyone in the campaign breathed a sigh of relief after Nevada. I hope that South Carolina and Super Tuesday will knock-out Sanders, and allow Hillary to concentrate on a general election strategy.

I want to strongly recommend that you add Anne Pence to one of the campaign's working groups -- particularly on economic policy, inclusive growth and job creation. I have known and worked with her now for over 15 years, first at State, and now at Covington. Anne was on my staff when I was Undersecretary of State for Economic, Business & Agricultural Affairs in the Clinton Administration, and continued with my successor, Ambassador Al Larson, for a total of some 9 years. She handled international economic and development policy as G8 policy advisor in support of our roles as G8 Foreign Affairs Sous Sherpa. She was a civil servant who remained in the Under Secretary's office (and accompanied the President's team at G8 prep meetings and Summits) because of her deep understanding of international machinery used to advance our economic interests (G8/G20, IFIs, UN, OECD, APEC and USAID and MCC), as well as sectors of key interest to the U.S., such as the financial sector, energy, manufacturing, labor markets, health, agriculture, high tech/IT and infrastructure.

She's a superb talent, who is able to cover the full breadth of international economic issues-- trade, investment, development assistance, international finance, health, climate change/sustainable development, anti-corruption, counter-terrorism finance, energy markets, as well as the global market economic conditions and challenges. Anne is also familiar with every USG agency involved in the international policy arena. She is among the most creative at marshaling evidence and arguments, in developing realistic initiatives, and in negotiating for consensus in extremely complex situations -- internationally as well as within our domestic bureaucracies. Anne is a Harvard-trained economist, with two masters degrees, one in economics, and the second at the Kennedy School in development. She is widely traveled, and has had direct experience with every region of the world, including on initiatives to help create jobs and stability in the Middle East. She's a huge asset, as well as collegial to work with. Below is a recent article she wrote on the G20.

Anne is co-hosting a fundraiser for Hillary this week, and has been a strong supporter from the start. I really believe she would be a great asset to the campaign.

Best wishes,

Can the G20 Pull the Global Economy Out of its Stall?

By Constance Anne Pence on February 19, 2016

In recent days, Citi strategist Jonathan Stubbs and his colleagues have warned that the global economy is trapped in a "death spiral."[1] Economist Mohamed El-Erian says that the era when policymakers could rely upon growth from easy money provided by Central Banks is over, and went on too long[2] . Nouriel Roubini, also known as Dr. Doom for calling the mortgage crisis before most others, believes that extreme volatility, sluggish growth, deflationary pressures, financial stress and "unconventional" monetary policies are part of a "new abnormal" that could last for years. [3] William White, who heads the OECD's Economic Development and Review Committee, not only warned of a possible financial crisis before it hit, but in 2012 wrote convincingly about the potential for "ultra-easy money" policies to have the unintended consequence of making things worse over time. [4]

Larry Summers now sees a one-in-three chance of a global recession[5] in the next three years. The IMF — known for somewhat rosy forecasting — has again lowered estimates of global growth, as has the OECD.[6] Yet, the IMF still projects over 3 percent annual global growth for 2016 and 2017[7], while more pessimistic forecasts cluster at just under 3 percent.[8] The U.S. economy puttered along at around 2.4 percent growth in 2015[9], with falling unemployment, real wage increases, strengthening bank balance sheets and various other signs of economic life, which bring some hope to the global economy.

So, why the doom and gloom? And what, pray tell, could be done to dodge another global recession?

The underlying realities of the global economy are a lot like the television commercial where an elderly woman cries out, "help, I've fallen and I can't get up." Since the great recession of 2008-2009, policymakers worldwide have relied upon liquidity flooded into global markets by Central Banks to mitigate the severe damage of financial meltdown. With this, we avoided global depression, but growth has yet to lift-off sustainably in the years thereafter. Governments most certainly should have used those years to ensure healthy financial sectors and balance sheets, to rationalize public budgets, to invest in the productivity of their people and economies, and to make major improvements in public and corporate governance and institutional integrity. They should have acted boldly to facilitate and reduce the cost of business start-ups, and to facilitate financial inclusion and reduce the risk and cost of private investment, including in infrastructure. But facing already hard-hit domestic economies, tight budgets and political opposition, few did. And policymakers now fear they have little monetary or fiscal ammunition, or public support, with which to combat fearsome global economic clouds.

Since the financial meltdown, already unhealthy levels of debt worldwide — public, corporate and household — have continued to rise[10] even as private investment, commodity prices and emerging economy stock markets collapsed. Developing country equities lost $4.3 trillion in value in Q3 of 2015 alone. Global unemployment rates meanwhile have remained stuck at around 6 percent. [11] International trade, a reliable indicator of economic vibrancy, has slowed to a crawl due to low demand, a lack of trade finance and outright protectionism. [12] [13] Manufacturing and industrial output too are down.[14] And even if China manages a soft landing while transitioning industries away from state-managed export production to a more market-oriented service economy — no small feat — its economic slowdown will continue to have broad impacts. China's growth was responsible for about one-third of global growth over the past seven years. Growth has to come from somewhere.

Emerging markets had been the global economy's best hope. But in 2015, nearly $1 trillion in investment capital fled from emerging markets, the first net outflow in 27 years. Oil prices have declined far steeper and faster than predicted, but that hasn't offset other strong headwinds, even in oil importing countries. A strong dollar and weakening Chinese yuan (despite some recent Chinese efforts to prop it up) only make it harder for emerging markets to manage debt while trying to finance basic goods and services. Trillions of dollars have been wiped off the books as stock markets rise and fall precipitously, especially in emerging markets. And despite extremely low interest rates, banks, investment funds, corporations and people are hoarding cash, preferring to save rather than spend or invest for higher yields.

And make no mistake, though hundreds of millions escaped poverty in recent decades (mostly in China), tens of millions have now fallen back into poverty, in rich as well as poor countries. This includes millions in Russia, a resource-rich country with skilled labor, where plummeting oil prices and spending on guns versus butter have reversed economic gains. Furthermore, deep and destabilizing inequalities persist globally, and are worsening. Popular frustrations threaten to boil over in many countries — as we saw during the Arab Spring. Today, the poorest half of the population typically holds less than 10% of the wealth, in developed and developing economies alike. Pew Foundation surveys[15] find that some 75 to 90 percent of people believe inequality to be extremely serious, and they fault their governments.

And this "new abnormal" of stagnating growth, social immobility and low confidence in institutions and leaders is dangerous. Along with the real risk of another wrenching global recession comes risk of even greater instability in a world plagued with high levels of geo-political instability and great uncertainty.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When people, political leaders and/or specific groups feel disenfranchised, targeted or blamed for economic dislocation and division, and helpless to make things better, they do not react well. Results can include nationalism, nativism, extremism, protectionism, military adventurism, conflict and violence. Such reactions are already evident in today's world. It's not the first time.

These dangers, and the economic cost and human suffering that would result from a global economic "death spiral," are neither inevitable nor insoluble. There are substantial, untapped global assets and opportunities for growth and progress. Thorny, persistent growth-barriers — such as corruption and weak rule of law and property rights — could be more effectively tackled rather than left to fester and undermine productivity. Good and coherent, not perfect, policy approaches might well encourage people to invest, take entrepreneurial risks to deliver new goods and services that are wanted and needed, or to improve and deliver existing products and services more efficiently. As Larry Summers recently opined, however, we seem "stuck." When times are tough economically and geopolitically, coordinated action among responsible governments may be most needed, but often hardest to achieve. But an "every country for itself" policy approach simply won't work to restart economic engines.

Fortunately, high-return opportunities for governments, communities and private enterprise to work together and invest productively worldwide are actually tremendous. Think about it: billions of people do not yet have regular access to basics such as clean water, reliable transportation, primary health care, electricity, literacy and useful skills, internet and communications technology, financial services, sanitation, housing , proper nutrition, a healthy natural environment, legal rights and accountable governance, and freedom from violence and repression. And even where those things are largely available, such as the United States and Europe, they cost more than they should and do not provide the best results possible. There are at least 20 highly-diverse countries with populations greater than 40 million — e.g. Algeria, Argentina, Bangladesh, Brazil, China, Colombia, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Egypt, Ethiopia, India, Indonesia, Iran, Kenya, Mexico, Myanmar, Nigeria, Pakistan, the Philippines, South Africa, Tanzania, Thailand, Turkey, Viet Nam — where creativity, drive and productivity have yet to be unleashed to anything near the potential. And even in countries with slow-growing and aging populations, there are plenty of unmet needs that markets could help to address — for better health, more convenient, reliable goods and services, and enriching social and cultural experiences.

The real dilemma now is what can and should be done to get out of any economic "death spiral." It certainly will require instilling confidence that an integrated global economy and pluralistic societies that value both inclusion and competition can work, and deliver lasting improvements in people's everyday lives. Nobel laureate economist Hernando de Soto recognized decades ago that a failure to integrate large swaths of people into the formal economy, with their property rights established and protected, would leave only an elite minority to enjoy the economic benefits of the law and globalization. The productivity and assets of those not included and protected by economic systems (tens of trillions of dollars) would languish as "dead capital." He knew all too well from violent peasant rebellion in his native Peru that failing to build social systems within which the poor (and the middle class, many would argue) can be productive and meet basic needs, especially while others prosper disproportionately, is a recipe for instability. And conflicted, divided societies grow more slowly, which only makes things worse. No surprise that all sorts of alarms are sounding just now.

G20 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors meet at the end of this month, February 26-27, in Shanghai. China chairs the G20 this year. G20 members represent around 85 per cent of global gross domestic product, over 75 per cent of global trade, and two-thirds of the world's population. The G20[16] also includes many of the emerging markets with the greatest untapped potential to help get us out of this "death spiral." The G20 could commit to specific measurable near- and longer-term steps and outcomes — together and individually — that would steer the global economy towards more confidence and certainty, and sustained growth, if they can agree together to take some politically-difficult steps. As IMF Managing Director LaGarde urges, we need a "New Partnership for Growth."[17]

Here are some growth-oriented policy initiatives and themes which could be part of urgent, concerted G20 effort to fuel shared global growth, job creation, financial stability and rising productivity:

1) Infrastructure with Integrity — Trillions of dollars of investment in new and rehabilitated infrastructure is needed worldwide, and good infrastructure correlates directly with growth.[18] It is estimated that redirecting savings toward efficient investment in emerging market infrastructure alone could increase global GDP by around 7 percent over the next 10 years.[19] Some two-thirds of all Africans still have no access to electricity, obviously a constraint to growth. But infrastructure spending is notoriously a place in which to hide corruption, waste and over-spending. With interest rates low, materials cheap and labor available, the G20 should act on its own superb work to launch an "Infrastructure with Integrity" initiative to match private investment (especially long-term institutional capital) with projects in countries committed to competition, transparency and supportive policies. Those countries and projects could also be supported by bilateral and multilateral funding, project development services, investment guarantees and risk insurance. Links to the Open Government Partnership (OGP) Initiative and Construction Sector Transparency (COST) initiative could help to reduce the risks that keep private investors on the side lines and out of such investments.

2) Trade and Investment Cost Reduction — The World Bank and other institutions have very useful ways of measuring the high cost and counterproductive impacts of logistical, legal and regulatory and other impediments to trade and investment and market entry barriers. The global implosion of trade and investment levels (both domestic and foreign) highlight the value of an urgent campaign to reduce such costs. By some estimates, the stock of products subjected by G20 members to non-tariff barriers and other less transparent restrictions is up by some 50 percent since the global financial crisis. The new G20 Trade and Investment Working Group could launch a program to support (with multilateral involvement) programs and commitments aimed at measurably reducing these costs and barriers at the national and regional level.

3) Business Ecosystem Development — Dynamic, inclusive economies flourish best where the "business ecosystem" for private enterprises of all sizes and types (including start-ups and disruptors) is healthy, competitive and integrated across the value chain. A G20 focus on analyzing and measurably improving and enabling such an "ecosystem" might better promote comprehensive action on elements that together promote efficiency and productivity — rule of law and property rights, institutional capacity and accountable governance (both public and private), sound and inclusive financial systems, efficient tax and regulatory systems, human capital investment and sustainable natural resource management. G20 Members could model success by auditing and committing to improve measurably their own "business ecosystems," building on indicators and indices maintained by the World Bank and other institutions.

4) Strong Fundamentals for Balanced Growth — The G20 has a Working Group on the Framework for Strong, Sustainable and Balanced Growth, but its crisis-era focus has been on near-term stabilization. It looks to be time for a pivot to committed steps on structural reform. Fiscal sustainability (which requires growth not just "austerity"), e.g. as regards entitlements and broader tax bases; labor market revitalization and reform; greater capacity for openness and innovation (e.g. intellectual property rights, R&D, information and communications services, continuous access for all to information and skills); strong bank balance sheets and greater financial sector resilience to crises (including appropriate deleveraging — corporate debt is very high in many emerging markets); and, international progress on modernizing tax policies, e.g. faster global implementation of the OECD Base Erosion and Profit-Shifting (BEPs) measures are all areas where committed action could benefit broad-based global growth.

5) Global Economic Coordination — This deserves careful analysis, because missteps could make things worse, and have unintended consequences, as some argue regarding "ultra-easy" monetary policies. However, it is clear that major economic imbalances co-exist along with tremendous volatility in global markets. The falling value of China's yuan and strengthening US dollar are creating tumult and uncertainty, especially for emerging markets. Emerging markets do not have access to reciprocal swap lines between central banks and their financial safety nets remain weak. This makes them more dependent on their FX reserves for financial stability. Whether there are better approaches is worth G20 discussion. At the same time, the complexity of financial markets globally, and especially in in developed-country markets, is known to have increased. Some believe that beyond the soundness of banks, the G20 need to examine and address the degree to which another "black swan" financial crisis could cause important segments of their financial markets to seize up from a lack of liquidity. French economist Hélène Rey[20] believes that her research shows that global market openness and integration has advanced to the point where there is now a "global financial cycle" responsible for some 25% of movement in open economies, including bubbles, booms and busts. That should give the G20 still more incentive to define and promote financial sector health broadly, and to consider the implications with respect to financial risk-taking.

So, it is true that global economic conditions are very precarious. Mohammed El Erian may well be right that we are at a critical "T juncture," where a wrong move, or lack of positive movement, could make recession all but inevitable. But there is also a lot of room for helpful G20 steps to achieve good if not perfect results, in part by reducing the enormous risk, uncertainty and fear that now burdens consumers, producers and investors. This is a test for the G20, and for China's important role as an emerging market leader. If the G20 can agree on concrete, effective, cooperative steps, we may finally see the end of this dismal period of economic gloom and doom, and less of the popular frustrations that appear to feed dangerous instability and extremism.

Hillary Rodham Clinton got a whole lot of love from the Bronx on Friday after telling children who are part of a summer arts program to dream big.

The Democratic former first lady and secretary of state and City Council Speaker Melissa Mark-Viverito were mobbed by hugging kids at a Bronx

Children's Museum event at Lehman College.

The show of affection came after Supreme Court Justice Sonia Sotomayor instructed more than 100 kids in attendance to fan out and hug audience members.

"I want a bunch of you to go to each of them and hug them and say thank you," Sotomayor instructed the primary school-goers, who had gathered around her onstage.

During brief remarks after a series of song and dance performances, Clinton, a potential 2016 presidential contender, told the kids to believe in themselves and ask for help to pursue their dreams.

"Dream big. Not only this program, but keep dreaming big because we need you," she said, adding that she'd been thinking about children a lot lately as she prepares to become a grandmother.

Clinton, who has been on tour selling her new book, "Hard Choices," also encouraged those gathered to read Sotomayor's autobiography about her life growing up in the Bronx.

Sotomayor recently dropped by a Clinton book signing event at a suburban Virginia Costco.

Friday's event honored the Dream Big summer arts enrichment program, which aims "to inspire children to dream, work hard, follow their passions."

Sotomayor has been a longtime supporter of the program and invited Clinton to attend Friday's event, a museum board member said.

Hillary Clinton took a break Friday from promoting her new book to tout the recent memoir of Supreme Court Justice Sonia Sotomayor.

"I hope you will read her autobiography," Clinton told hundreds of grade-school kids in the Bronx, as Sotomayor looked on.

"She tells the story of how as a child of the Bronx, she dreamed big and ended up on the highest court of the land," Clinton said. "She's one of our heroes."

Clinton and the Bronx-born Sotomayor — whose book, "My Beloved World," was published this year — were the star speakers at the Bronx Children's Museum annual Dream Big event at Lehman College.

Clinton smiled through almost two hours of children's dance performances and remarks by Latino elected officials and public figures, including City Council Speaker Melissa Mark-Viverito and actress Sonia Manzano, who plays Maria on "Sesame Street."

"Every one of us had to dream big, or we wouldn't be where we are today," Clinton said.

"I'm going to be a grandmother for the first time, so I'm thinking a lot about children. ... I saw the future up here on this stage. Always believe in yourself and know that many, many others believe in you."

In Harlem, Clinton's daughter, Chelsea, also spent time with children, at the Disney Junior's Pirate & Princess event where she talked about "the power of doing good."

Fareed Zakaria speaks with former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton about U.S. relations with Russia. Watch the full interview on "Fareed Zakaria GPS," this Sunday at 10 a.m. and 1 p.m. ET on CNN

You say in your book that you felt – and you've said in interviews subsequently – that the reset with Russia worked because you got a new strategic arms treaty out of it, you got the Russians to agree to sanctions on Iran. Why do you think that it stopped working? What changed?

Well, I thought a lot about that, because I was among the most skeptical of Putin during the time that I was there, in part because I thought he had never given up on his vision of bringing Mother Russia back to the forefront. Not by looking at what Russia could do to be a modern nation, but by looking to the past, and especially trying to control their borders from Central Asia to the Baltics.

So when he announced in the fall of 2011 that he would be changing positions with Medvedev, I knew that he would be more difficult to deal with. He had been always the power behind Medvedev, but he had given Medvedev a lot of independence to do exactly what you said and make the reset a success.

I saw that firsthand with respect to the primary elections in Russia, because they were filled with irregularities and Russian people poured out in the streets to protest. And I, as Secretary of State, said the Russians deserve better. They deserved elections that reflected their will.

Putin attacked me personally because he is very worried about any kind of internal dissent. He wanted to clamp down on any opposition within Russia and he wanted to provide more influence and even intimidation on his borders.

And I certainly made my views known in meetings, as well as in memos to the president. I think that what may have happened is that both the United States and Europe were really hoping for the best from Putin as a returned president. And I think we've been quickly, unfortunately, disabused of those hopes.

CNN: "Hillary Clinton: Putin 'bears responsibility' in downing of MH17"

By Jason Miks

July 25, 2014

Russian President Vladimir Putin bears at least some responsibility for the shooting down of Malaysia Airlines Flight MH17, former U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said Friday.

"I think if there were any doubt it should be gone by now, that Vladimir Putin, certainly indirectly -- through his support of the insurgents in eastern Ukraine and the supply of advanced weapons and, frankly, the presence of Russian Special Forces and intelligence agents -- bears responsibility for what happened," she told CNN's Fareed Zakaria in an exclusive interview that will air Sunday.

Clinton's comments come just over a week since Flight MH17 crashed in eastern Ukraine, killing all 298 on board. Pro-Russian militants have been accused of downing the plane using Russia-supplied armaments and of interfering with the subsequent investigation at the crash site.

U.S. President Barack Obama last week called the crash a "wake-up call for Europe and the world that there are consequences to an escalating conflict in eastern Ukraine," a view Clinton echoed in urging Europe to go further.

"We have to up the sanctions that are required. The United States has continued to move forward on that, Europe has been reluctant," Clinton told. "They need to understand they must stand up to Vladimir Putin."

Her comments came as the Pentagon warned that Russia is preparing to transfer more powerful weaponry into Ukraine, a move it said could happen at any time.

Putin has argued that Ukraine bears significant responsibility, saying in a statement that if military operations had not resumed in eastern Ukraine on June 28, "this tragedy probably could have been avoided."

However, Clinton joined a chorus of Western voices laying much of the blame at Moscow's door, and she lamented that the United States and Europe had been "disabused" of their earlier hopes over the so-called reset in U.S.-Russia relations that was announced during President Obama's first year in office.

"He [Putin] has a strategic plan in mind, the Eurasian Union, which would be in competition to Europe," Clinton said. "His continuing efforts to intimidate Europeans -- not just through energy, but through interfering in elections, putting money behind buying press outlets in European countries ... trying to discourage countries like Ukraine being able to join the European Union."

"And if the United States and Europe don't present a united front, I think Putin is the kind of man who will go as far as he can get away with. I think he is still smart enough and cautious enough to be pushed back. But there has to be a push in order to make that happen."

'He's a very arrogant person to deal with'

Clinton also shared her thoughts on her interactions with Putin during her stint as Obama's secretary of state.

"He's very tough. He's a very arrogant person to deal with, which I think is a combination of this vision of Russia and some fundamental insecurity, because when you are dealing with him, he often acts as though he could care less," Clinton said.

"...There was a G20 summit in Los Cabos (Mexico, in 2012) and our President had a meeting scheduled. He kept President Obama waiting 40 minutes before he showed up. He sat down. It was a very small meeting on both sides of the table. We, at the time, were very hopeful -- not realistically so, but idealistically so -- that we could get more cooperation from Russia to slow down (Bashar) al-Assad and what he was doing in Syria," she said. "Putin could not have looked more bored, more discomfited, and never apologized for being late."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"So then, of course, he wanted a summit in Russia. He wanted to play the host. And my advice to the president was don't go chasing after him. We're not sure of what his real intent is."

Has Israel committed war crimes?

In a wide-ranging interview, Clinton also discussed the ongoing violence in Gaza as Israel's ground incursion entered its second week. Asked about the warning Wednesday by U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights Navi Pillay that war crimes may have been committed, and whether Israel has used excessive force, Clinton said she did not agree with the war crimes assessment.

"I think that the Israelis are in a very difficult position. Hamas, we know, embeds missiles, embeds command-and-control units in civilian areas," she said. "Now, some of that is just the geography. It's a very small area, very densely populated. But some of that is a deliberate choice by Hamas."

However, she said, "too many people have died and too many of them are clearly innocent civilians, even children."

More than 800 people have been killed in the more than two weeks of violence in Gaza, as diplomats scramble to establish a ceasefire. Palestinian leaders called for a day of rage as protests erupted in the West Bank following a strike this week on a U.N. shelter. Israel's security cabinet on Friday unanimously rejected a proposed one-week humanitarian ceasefire, Israeli Intelligence Minister Yuval Steinitz told CNN. Secretary of State John Kerry said later that there was a framework for a cease-fire, but that more needed to be done to make it happen.

"They [the Israelis] understand the terrible box that they find themselves in because they want to end the rockets. And unfortunately, since the last ceasefire, the Hamas leadership has felt cornered. And the only way out of that corner, in their opinion, was to get better, more accurate, longer range rockets.

"And they've been digging tunnels, apparently constantly, that can come up inside Israeli territory. And the Israelis have a perfectly legitimate objective to try to destroy as much as of the rocketry as they can and to destroy the tunnels."

Politico: "Hillary Clinton calls Putin arrogant, charming"

By Katie Glueck

July 25, 2014, 2:48 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton called Russian President Vladimir Putin "tough" and "arrogant" — if at times capable of charm — and noted that she had raised concerns about him to President Barack Obama.

She made the comments in an interview with CNN journalist Fareed Zakaria, set to air on his eponymous show at 10 a.m. Sunday.

"He acts, you know, bored and dismissive," said Clinton, the former secretary of state and possible 2016 Democratic frontrunner, according to a transcript released Friday. "So he has a lot of personas that he pulls out — if he wants to stare intently at you with his very, you know, bright blue eyes, because he wants something from you, or he wants to convey a message to you, he can turn on the charm. But he can also be, you know, very tough to deal with and act as though it's a burden on him to be in conversations with other world leaders."

Clinton, who has defended the Obama administration's "reset" of relations with Russia as being effective for a time, also noted in the interview that she "was among the most skeptical of Putin." Clinton, on tour to promote her new memoir of her time at the State Department, "Hard Choices," has generated much scrutiny over the extent to which her foreign policy views aligned with others in the administration.

In the interview, she made clear that she communicated her later reservations about Putin to Obama.

"I, you know, certainly made my views known in, you know, in meetings, as well as in memos to the president," she said. Regarding the long-term viability of the "reset," she said that "I think that what may have happened, is that both the United States and Europe were really hoping for the best from Putin as a returned president. And I think we've been quickly, unfortunately, disabused of those hopes."

Politico blog: Dylan Byers on Media: "Hillary Clinton on 'Fusion' Tuesday "

By Dylan Byers

July 25, 2014, 2:23 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton gave a one-on-one interview to Jorge Ramos on Friday, which will air Tuesday on Fusion's "America with Jorge Ramos."

Ramos and the former Secretary of State discussed "the latest headlines, the political climate as the country approaches the 2014 and 2016 elections, as well as her book 'Hard Choices,'" according to a Fusion spokesperson. A preview, in which Clinton discusses the border crisis, will air tonight on Univision.

Clinton's interview with Ramos followed an hour-long interview with CNN's Fareed Zakaria, which will air Sunday.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Poll Data Show Little Gap Between Democrats and Liberals"

By Dante Chinni

July 25, 2014, 3:10 p.m. EDT

After spending most of the primary season analyzing Republican and conservative voters, let's take a look at the Democrats and liberals.

Polls suggest there are far fewer self-described "liberals" in America than there are "conservatives," even though those same polls tend to show that there are more Democrats than there are Republicans. For instance, the latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll finds 41% identified themselves as Democrats and 36% as Republicans. Yet only 22% identified themselves as "liberal," while 36% — matching the GOP number — identified themselves at "conservative."

That 19-point difference between liberals and Democrats has garnered a lot of attention lately as some analysts have theorized that anointed Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton, if she runs, could face a challenge on her left flank some someone representing the liberal wing of the party. Some of the popular names mentioned include Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren and Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But there is a problem with that formulation of the splits within the party, at least where the data are concerned: The difference between liberals and rank-and-file Democrats simply isn't the gulf some people might imagine. On long list of issues – from education reform to carbon dioxide emissions to, notably, Ms. Clinton's potential candidacy – the differences are fairly negligible.

On the question of approval for how President Obama is handling his job, Democrats are at 75% approval, liberals are at 74%. On how Mr. Obama is handling foreign policy – 67% of Democrats approve and 63% of liberals.

And there are more issues on the agreement list including more philosophical points.

Democrats and Liberals on a Range of Issues

[COMPARISON GRAPH OF DEMOCRATS AND LIBERALS]

So what is the difference between liberals and Democrats? Most demographic measures don't show big splits, according to the latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll.

Among Democrats 64% are white, 21% African-American and 15% are Hispanic. Among liberals, 66% are white, 18% are African-America and 15% are Hispanic. Liberals are slightly more likely to be college graduates and are slightly more likely to live in the South or the West, but those differences amount to a few percentage points here or there.

A

The real difference comes in age. As a group, liberals are much younger than Democrats – 39% of liberals are between ages 18 and 34, that's true of only 26% of Democrats.

Age Breakdown for Liberals

There may be a few points behind that age difference, but seeing as there not dramatic differences between Democrats and liberals, it may be that the divide is primarily one of nomenclature. People in the 18- to 34-year-old age group may simply be more comfortable with using the word "liberal," even though their positions are largely in line with rank-and-file Democrats who don't use that word.

When look deep enough at the numbers, some differences emerge between liberals and Democrats where that age difference may play a role.

The June poll showed liberals are much more likely to say "climate change has been established as a serious problem and immediate action is necessary" – 61% versus 50% for Democrats. That same poll showed liberals are more likely to say that poverty today is more likely "caused by circumstances beyond people's control" – 72% versus 63% for Democrats.

But even in those cases the numbers largely reflect a difference in degree of support, not a strongly different point of view. In the case of climate change, both Democrats and liberals strongly agree – 80% or more – that climate change is taking place and action should be taken.

Taken together, the numbers suggest that future of the Democratic Party may be more "liberal" but it's not clear what difference that will actually make in terms of position and policy. And, more important for the immediate future and 2016, splitting the "liberal" and "Democratic" electorates may be a very difficult thing to do.

Associated Press: "Despite Clinton: O'Malley In Iowa Amid 2016 Talk"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Ken Thomas and Thomas Beaumont

July 26, 2014, 3:54 a.m. EDT

Martin O'Malley's latest foray into Iowa begins, appropriately, in a place called Clinton.

The Maryland governor is filling the void in Iowa, New Hampshire and beyond during the early stages of the 2016 presidential race, campaigning for fellow Democrats and making personal appeals while former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton remains the prohibitive — if yet undeclared — favorite.

In the summer before November's mid-term elections, Clinton's dominant position in a hypothetical field has limited Democrats' activities in early presidential voting states even while an ambitious slate of Republicans descend. Active Democrats here say O'Malley has become an exception, cultivating relationships and developing a reputation as a loyal foot soldier for the party.

"He's doing more than anybody else," said Mike Gronstal, the Iowa Senate Democratic leader. "Others have indicated they are interested in doing some things. But we haven't seen it yet." He declined to name the other Democrats who have inquired.

O'Malley is laying the groundwork for a presidential campaign whether or not Clinton runs, although it remains unclear if he will challenge the popular former first lady. O'Malley was the second governor to endorse Mrs. Clinton's presidential campaign in 2007 and maintains ties to former President Bill Clinton, who brought the then-Baltimore mayor to Northern Ireland on a presidential delegation trip in 2000 and appeared in an ad for O'Malley during his first campaign for governor.

As his second term in Maryland ends, O'Malley has visited New Hampshire twice since November and raised money for Gov. Maggie Hassan, Sen. Jeanne Shaheen — a fellow alumnus of Gary Hart's presidential campaigns — and Rep. Annie Kuster. In South Carolina, O'Malley has held events for Vincent Sheheen, who is challenging GOP Gov. Nikki Haley, and Bakari Sellers, who is running for lieutenant governor.

O'Malley was returning to Iowa on Saturday, headlining a fundraiser for state Sen. Rita Hart in Clinton, a town on the banks of the Mississippi River, and another event in North Liberty for Kevin Kinney, a Johnson County sheriff's deputy seeking an open state Senate seat. After a Saturday night speech in Omaha to help the Nebraska Democratic Party, O'Malley was joining with Democratic gubernatorial candidate Jack Hatch, who is challenging Republican Gov. Terry Branstad, for fundraisers in western Iowa on Sunday and a canvassing kickoff in Sioux City.

O'Malley made a round of fundraising appearances for Hatch in Iowa last month, along with a speech at the state party convention. Iowa Democrats hold a narrow majority in the state Senate and party officials here said the governor's willingness to wade into local races was appreciated — and duly noted.

"Helping out legislative races is a really smart strategy. It's an easy way to come out and be helpful," said Norm Sterzenbach, a former executive director of the Iowa Democratic Party. He noted that O'Malley got his political start in Iowa, as a field organizer for Gary Hart's 1984 presidential campaign in eastern Iowa.

O'Malley's fundraising and campaign travel has coincided with a policy fight with the Obama administration on the stream of unaccompanied immigrant children from Central America over the Mexican border. He recently criticized a White House proposal that could expedite the deportation of the children, saying it would "send them back to certain death." Obama's team pushed back, leaking a phone call in which the governor asked the White House not to have children brought to a Maryland facility.

O'Malley's stance has won support within Latino groups and has marked a contrast with Clinton. She said at a televised forum that she felt the children needed to be reunited with their families but the U.S. needed to make clear that "just because your child gets across the border doesn't mean your child gets to stay."

To be sure, O'Malley is not the only Democrat extending feelers in the politically active state. Clinton, who placed a disappointing third in the 2008 caucus, recorded a humorous tribute to retiring Sen. Tom Harkin that aired at the state party convention dinner. Ready for Hillary, an unaffiliated organization laying the groundwork for a Clinton campaign, has been active in Iowa and Democrats are buzzing about whether Hillary Clinton — or former President Bill Clinton — will appear at Harkin's annual steak fry in September, his last as a senator.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Biden, who headlined the steak fry last year, notably dropped by a Washington hotel in May to greet a group of Iowans attending the Greater Des Moines Partnership meeting. Minnesota Sen. Amy Klobuchar plans to campaign next month in Iowa for Rep. Bruce Braley, who is seeking Harkin's seat.

Hart, the state senator and one of O'Malley's beneficiaries this weekend, said she has never met the governor before or spoken to him — his staff reached out about the fundraiser. She said her husband's aunt lives in Maryland, admires his record and urged her to get to know him. But like many Iowans, that's the extent of her knowledge for now.

"I really don't think many people know anything about him. I think he's a pretty new name to a lot of people," Hart said. "That's probably why he's coming — he wants to change that."

Associated Press: "U.S. Evacuates Embassy in Libya Amid Clashes"

By Matthew Lee and Lara Jakes

July 26, 2014, 11:12 a.m. EDT

The United States shuttered its embassy in Libya on Saturday and evacuated its diplomats to neighboring Tunisia under U.S. military escort as fighting intensified between rival militias. Secretary of State John Kerry said "free-wheeling militia violence" prompted the move.

American personnel at the Tripoli embassy, which had already been operating with limited staffing, left the capital around dawn and traveled by road to neighboring Tunisia, with U.S. fighter jets and other aircraft providing protection, the State Department said. The withdrawal underscored the Obama administration's concern about the heightened risk to American diplomats abroad, particularly in Libya where memories of the deadly 2012 attack on the U.S. mission in the eastern city of Benghazi are still vivid.

The evacuation was accompanied by a new State Department travel warning for Libya urging Americans not to go to the country and recommending that those already there leave immediately. "The Libyan government has not been able to adequately build its military and police forces and improve security," it said. "Many military-grade weapons remain in the hands of private individuals, including anti-aircraft weapons that may be used against civilian aviation."

Speaking Saturday in Paris where he was meeting with other diplomats on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Kerry said the U.S. remains committed to the diplomatic process in Libya despite the suspension of embassy activities there. State Department spokeswoman Marie Harf said the evacuated employees will continue to work on Libyan issues in Tunis, elsewhere in North Africa and Washington.

"Securing our facilities and ensuring the safety of our personnel are top department priorities, and we did not make this decision lightly," Harf said. "Security has to come first. Regrettably, we had to take this step because the location of our embassy is in very close proximity to intense fighting and ongoing violence between armed Libyan factions."

The Pentagon said in statement that F-16 fighter jets and other U.S. aircraft provided security. "The mission was conducted without incident, and the entire operation lasted approximately five hours," the statement said.

The State Department said embassy operations will be suspended until a determination is made that the security situation has improved. Tripoli has been embroiled for weeks in inter-militia violence that has killed and wounded dozens on all sides. The fighting has been particularly intense at the city's airport.

"We are committed to supporting the Libyan people during this challenging time, and are currently exploring options for a permanent return to Tripoli as soon as the security situation on the ground improves," Harf said.

Rep. Howard "Buck" McKeon, R-Calif., the House Armed Services Committee chairman, expressed gratitude for the work of the U.S. forces that helped in the evacuation.

The move marks the second time in a little more than three years that Washington has closed its embassy in Libya. In February 2011, the embassy suspended operations during the uprising that eventually toppled longtime leader Moammar Gadhafi. After the formation of a transitional government in July 2011, the embassy reopened in September. Gadhafi was killed in October 2011.

The Obama administration has been particularly sensitive about security of U.S. government employees in Libya since the Sept. 11, 2012, attack on the U.S. mission in the country's second largest city of Benghazi. The attack killed Ambassador Chris Stevens and three other Americans. The administration is still fending off criticism from Republicans and others that it did not take the needed steps to enhance security in Benghazi or evacuate the mission due to rising violence in that city in the months prior to the attack.

The Benghazi mission was abandoned after that attack and never reopened. The embassy In Tripoli has been operating with reduced staff since but has remained open even as the violence intensified.

On Friday, U.S. Ambassador to Libya Deborah Jones appealed for fighting near the embassy to stop. "We have not been attacked but our neighborhood a bit 2 close to the action," she tweeted. "Diplomatic missions 2 B avoided pls." Jones had also tweeted about "heavy shelling and other exchanges" of fire in the vicinity of the embassy. Speculation about an evacuation had been rife at the State Department for more than a week.

Libya is now witnessing one of its worst spasms of violence since Gadhafi's ouster. In Tripoli, the militias are fighting mostly for control of the airport. They are on the government's payroll because authorities have depended on them to restore order.

The U.S. is the latest in a number of countries to have closed diplomatic operations in Libya. Turkey on Friday announced that it had shut its embassy and militia clashes in Benghazi have prompted the United Nations, aid groups and foreign envoys to leave.

In Tripoli, clashes near the international airport have forced residents to evacuate their homes nearby after they were hit by shells. On Friday, the official Libyan news agency LANA reported that explosions were heard early in the day near the airport area and continued into the afternoon.

The battle in Tripoli began earlier this month when Islamist-led militias — mostly from the western city of Misrata — launched a surprise assault on the airport, under control of rival militias from the western mountain town of Zintan. On Monday, a $113 million Airbus A330 passenger jet for Libya's state-owned Afriqiyah Airways was destroyed in the fighting.

The rival militias, made up largely of former anti-Gadhafi rebels, have forced a weeklong closure of gas stations and government offices. In recent days, armed men have attacked vehicles carrying money from the Central Bank to local banks, forcing their closure.

Libyan government officials and activists have increasingly been targeted in the violence. Gunmen kidnapped two lawmakers in the western suburbs of Tripoli a week ago and on Friday armed men abducted Abdel-Moaz Banoun, a well-known Libyan political activist in Tripoli, according to his father.

An umbrella group for Islamist militias, called the Operation Room of Libya's Revolutionaries, said in a brief statement on its Facebook page on Friday that "troops arrested Abdel-Moaz over allegations that he served under Gadhafi" and "instigated rallies against" the Islamists.

Dear Jake,

I am sure everyone in the campaign breathed a sigh of relief after Nevada. I hope that South Carolina and Super Tuesday will knock-out Sanders, and allow Hillary to concentrate on a general election strategy.

I want to strongly recommend that you add Anne Pence to one of the campaign's working groups -- particularly on economic policy, inclusive growth and job creation. I have known and worked with her now for over 15 years, first at State, and now at Covington. Anne was on my staff when I was Undersecretary of State for Economic, Business & Agricultural Affairs in the Clinton Administration, and continued with my successor, Ambassador Al Larson, for a total of some 9 years. She handled international economic and development policy as G8 policy advisor in support of our roles as G8 Foreign Affairs Sous Sherpa. She was a civil servant who remained in the Under Secretary's office (and accompanied the President's team at G8 prep meetings and Summits) because of her deep understanding of international machinery used to advance our economic interests (G8/G20, IFIs, UN, OECD, APEC and USAID and MCC), as well as sectors of key interest to the U.S., such as the financial sector, energy, manufacturing, labor markets, health, agriculture, high tech/IT and infrastructure.

She's a superb talent, who is able to cover the full breadth of international economic issues-- trade, investment, development assistance, international finance, health, climate change/sustainable development, anti-corruption, counter-terrorism finance, energy markets, as well as the global market economic conditions and challenges. Anne is also familiar with every USG agency involved in the international policy arena. She is among the most creative at marshaling evidence and arguments, in developing realistic initiatives, and in negotiating for consensus in extremely complex situations -- internationally as well as within our domestic bureaucracies. Anne is a Harvard-trained economist, with two masters degrees, one in economics, and the second at the Kennedy School in development. She is widely traveled, and has had direct experience with every region of the world, including on initiatives to help create jobs and stability in the Middle East. She's a huge asset, as well as collegial to work with. Below is a recent article she wrote on the G20.

Anne is co-hosting a fundraiser for Hillary this week, and has been a strong supporter from the start. I really believe she would be a great asset to the campaign.

Best wishes,

Can the G20 Pull the Global Economy Out of its Stall?

By Constance Anne Pence on February 19, 2016

In recent days, Citi strategist Jonathan Stubbs and his colleagues have warned that the global economy is trapped in a "death spiral."[1] Economist Mohamed El-Erian says that the era when policymakers could rely upon growth from easy money provided by Central Banks is over, and went on too long[2] . Nouriel Roubini, also known as Dr. Doom for calling the mortgage crisis before most others, believes that extreme volatility, sluggish growth, deflationary pressures, financial stress and "unconventional" monetary policies are part of a "new abnormal" that could last for years. [3] William White, who heads the OECD's Economic Development and Review Committee, not only warned of a possible financial crisis before it hit, but in 2012 wrote convincingly about the potential for "ultra-easy money" policies to have the unintended consequence of making things worse over time. [4]

Larry Summers now sees a one-in-three chance of a global recession[5] in the next three years. The IMF — known for somewhat rosy forecasting — has again lowered estimates of global growth, as has the OECD.[6] Yet, the IMF still projects over 3 percent annual global growth for 2016 and 2017[7] , while more pessimistic forecasts cluster at just under 3 percent.[8] The U.S. economy puttered along at around 2.4 percent growth in 2015[9] , with falling unemployment, real wage increases, strengthening bank balance sheets and various other signs of economic life, which bring some hope to the global economy.

So, why the doom and gloom? And what, pray tell, could be done to dodge another global recession?

The underlying realities of the global economy are a lot like the television commercial where an elderly woman cries out, "help, I've fallen and I can't get up." Since the great recession of 2008-2009, policymakers worldwide have relied upon liquidity flooded into global markets by Central Banks to mitigate the severe damage of financial meltdown. With this, we avoided global depression, but growth has yet to lift-off sustainably in the years thereafter. Governments most certainly should have used those years to ensure healthy financial sectors and balance sheets, to rationalize public budgets, to invest in the productivity of their people and economies, and to make major improvements in public and corporate governance and institutional integrity. They should have acted boldly to facilitate and reduce the cost of business start-ups, and to facilitate financial inclusion and reduce the risk and cost of private investment, including in infrastructure. But facing already hard-hit domestic economies, tight budgets and political opposition, few did. And policymakers now fear they have little monetary or fiscal ammunition, or public support, with which to combat fearsome global economic clouds.

Since the financial meltdown, already unhealthy levels of debt worldwide — public, corporate and household — have continued to rise[10] even as private investment, commodity prices and emerging economy stock markets collapsed. Developing country equities lost $4.3 trillion in value in Q3 of 2015 alone. Global unemployment rates meanwhile have remained stuck at around 6 percent. [11] International trade, a reliable indicator of economic vibrancy, has slowed to a crawl due to low demand, a lack of trade finance and outright protectionism. [12] [13] Manufacturing and industrial output too are down.[14] And even if China manages a soft landing while transitioning industries away from state-managed export production to a more market-oriented service economy — no small feat — its economic slowdown will continue to have broad impacts. China's growth was responsible for about one-third of global growth over the past seven years. Growth has to come from somewhere.

Emerging markets had been the global economy's best hope. But in 2015, nearly $1 trillion in investment capital fled from emerging markets, the first net outflow in 27 years. Oil prices have declined far steeper and faster than predicted, but that hasn't offset other strong headwinds, even in oil importing countries. A strong dollar and weakening Chinese yuan (despite some recent Chinese efforts to prop it up) only make it harder for emerging markets to manage debt while trying to finance basic goods and services. Trillions of dollars have been wiped off the books as stock markets rise and fall precipitously, especially in emerging markets. And despite extremely low interest rates, banks, investment funds, corporations and people are hoarding cash, preferring to save rather than spend or invest for higher yields.

And make no mistake, though hundreds of millions escaped poverty in recent decades (mostly in China), tens of millions have now fallen back into poverty, in rich as well as poor countries. This includes millions in Russia, a resource-rich country with skilled labor, where plummeting oil prices and spending on guns versus butter have reversed economic gains. Furthermore, deep and destabilizing inequalities persist globally, and are worsening. Popular frustrations threaten to boil over in many countries — as we saw during the Arab Spring. Today, the poorest half of the population typically holds less than 10% of the wealth, in developed and developing economies alike. Pew Foundation surveys[15] find that some 75 to 90 percent of people believe inequality to be extremely serious, and they fault their governments.

And this "new abnormal" of stagnating growth, social immobility and low confidence in institutions and leaders is dangerous. Along with the real risk of another wrenching global recession comes risk of even greater instability in a world plagued with high levels of geo-political instability and great uncertainty. When people, political leaders and/or specific groups feel disenfranchised, targeted or blamed for economic dislocation and division, and helpless to make things better, they do not react well. Results can include nationalism, nativism, extremism, protectionism, military adventurism, conflict and violence. Such reactions are already evident in today's world. It's not the first time.

These dangers, and the economic cost and human suffering that would result from a global economic "death spiral," are neither inevitable nor insoluble. There are substantial, untapped global assets and opportunities for growth and progress. Thorny, persistent growth-barriers — such as corruption and weak rule of law and property rights — could be more effectively tackled rather than left to fester and undermine productivity. Good and coherent, not perfect, policy approaches might well encourage people to invest, take entrepreneurial risks to deliver new goods and services that are wanted and needed, or to improve and deliver existing products and services more efficiently. As Larry Summers recently opined, however, we seem "stuck." When times are tough economically and geopolitically, coordinated action among responsible governments may be most needed, but often hardest to achieve. But an "every country for itself" policy approach simply won't work to restart economic engines.

Fortunately, high-return opportunities for governments, communities and private enterprise to work together and invest productively worldwide are actually tremendous. Think about it: billions of people do not yet have regular access to basics such as clean water, reliable transportation, primary health care, electricity, literacy and useful skills, internet and communications technology, financial services, sanitation, housing , proper nutrition, a healthy natural environment, legal rights and accountable governance, and freedom from violence and repression. And even where those things are largely available, such as the United States and Europe, they cost more than they should and do not provide the best results possible. There are at least 20 highly-diverse countries with populations greater than 40 million — e.g. Algeria, Argentina, Bangladesh, Brazil, China, Colombia, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Egypt, Ethiopia, India, Indonesia, Iran, Kenya, Mexico, Myanmar, Nigeria, Pakistan, the Philippines, South Africa, Tanzania, Thailand, Turkey, Viet Nam — where creativity, drive and productivity have yet to be unleashed to anything near the potential. And even in countries with slow-growing and aging populations, there are plenty of unmet needs that markets could help to address — for better health, more convenient, reliable goods and services, and enriching social and cultural experiences.

The real dilemma now is what can and should be done to get out of any economic "death spiral." It certainly will require instilling confidence that an integrated global economy and pluralistic societies that value both inclusion and competition can work, and deliver lasting improvements in people's everyday lives. Nobel laureate economist Hernando de Soto recognized decades ago that a failure to integrate large swaths of people into the formal economy, with their property rights established and protected, would leave only an elite minority to enjoy the economic benefits of the law and globalization. The productivity and assets of those not included and protected by economic systems (tens of trillions of dollars) would languish as "dead capital." He knew all too well from violent peasant rebellion in his native Peru that failing to build social systems within which the poor (and the middle class, many would argue) can be productive and meet basic needs, especially while others prosper disproportionately, is a recipe for instability. And conflicted, divided societies grow more slowly, which only makes things worse. No surprise that all sorts of alarms are sounding just now.

G20 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors meet at the end of this month, February 26-27, in Shanghai. China chairs the G20 this year. G20 members represent around 85 per cent of global gross domestic product, over 75 per cent of global trade, and two-thirds of the world's population. The G20[16] also includes many of the emerging markets with the greatest untapped potential to help get us out of this "death spiral." The G20 could commit to specific measurable near- and longer-term steps and outcomes — together and individually — that would steer the global economy towards more confidence and certainty, and sustained growth, if they can agree together to take some politically-difficult steps. As IMF Managing Director LaGarde urges, we need a "New Partnership for Growth."[17]

Here are some growth-oriented policy initiatives and themes which could be part of urgent, concerted G20 effort to fuel shared global growth, job creation, financial stability and rising productivity:

1) Infrastructure with Integrity — Trillions of dollars of investment in new and rehabilitated infrastructure is needed worldwide, and good infrastructure correlates directly with growth.[18] It is estimated that redirecting savings toward efficient investment in emerging market infrastructure alone could increase global GDP by around 7 percent over the next 10 years.[19] Some two-thirds of all Africans still have no access to electricity, obviously a constraint to growth. But infrastructure spending is notoriously a place in which to hide corruption, waste and over-spending. With interest rates low, materials cheap and labor available, the G20 should act on its own superb work to launch an "Infrastructure with Integrity" initiative to match private investment (especially long-term institutional capital) with projects in countries committed to competition, transparency and supportive policies. Those countries and projects could also be supported by bilateral and multilateral funding, project development services, investment guarantees and risk insurance. Links to the Open Government Partnership (OGP) Initiative and Construction Sector Transparency (COST) initiative could help to reduce the risks that keep private investors on the side lines and out of such investments.

2) Trade and Investment Cost Reduction — The World Bank and other institutions have very useful ways of measuring the high cost and counterproductive impacts of logistical, legal and regulatory and other impediments to trade and investment and market entry barriers. The global implosion of trade and investment levels (both domestic and foreign) highlight the value of an urgent campaign to reduce such costs. By some estimates, the stock of products subjected by G20 members to non-tariff barriers and other less transparent restrictions is up by some 50 percent since the global financial crisis. The new G20 Trade and Investment Working Group could launch a program to support (with multilateral involvement) programs and commitments aimed at measurably reducing these costs and barriers at the national and regional level.

3) Business Ecosystem Development — Dynamic, inclusive economies flourish best where the "business ecosystem" for private enterprises of all sizes and types (including start-ups and disruptors) is healthy, competitive and integrated across the value chain. A G20 focus on analyzing and measurably improving and enabling such an "ecosystem" might better promote comprehensive action on elements that together promote efficiency and productivity — rule of law and property rights, institutional capacity and accountable governance (both public and private), sound and inclusive financial systems, efficient tax and regulatory systems, human capital investment and sustainable natural resource management. G20 Members could model success by auditing and committing to improve measurably their own "business ecosystems," building on indicators and indices maintained by the World Bank and other institutions.

4) Strong Fundamentals for Balanced Growth — The G20 has a Working Group on the Framework for Strong, Sustainable and Balanced Growth, but its crisis-era focus has been on near-term stabilization. It looks to be time for a pivot to committed steps on structural reform. Fiscal sustainability (which requires growth not just "austerity"), e.g. as regards entitlements and broader tax bases; labor market revitalization and reform; greater capacity for openness and innovation (e.g. intellectual property rights, R&D, information and communications services, continuous access for all to information and skills); strong bank balance sheets and greater financial sector resilience to crises (including appropriate deleveraging — corporate debt is very high in many emerging markets); and, international progress on modernizing tax policies, e.g. faster global implementation of the OECD Base Erosion and Profit-Shifting (BEPs) measures are all areas where committed action could benefit broad-based global growth.

5) Global Economic Coordination — This deserves careful analysis, because missteps could make things worse, and have unintended consequences, as some argue regarding "ultra-easy" monetary policies. However, it is clear that major economic imbalances co-exist along with tremendous volatility in global markets. The falling value of China's yuan and strengthening US dollar are creating tumult and uncertainty, especially for emerging markets. Emerging markets do not have access to reciprocal swap lines between central banks and their financial safety nets remain weak. This makes them more dependent on their FX reserves for financial stability. Whether there are better approaches is worth G20 discussion. At the same time, the complexity of financial markets globally, and especially in in developed-country markets, is known to have increased. Some believe that beyond the soundness of banks, the G20 need to examine and address the degree to which another "black swan" financial crisis could cause important segments of their financial markets to seize up from a lack of liquidity. French economist Hélène Rey[20] believes that her research shows that global market openness and integration has advanced to the point where there is now a "global financial cycle" responsible for some 25% of movement in open economies, including bubbles, booms and busts. That should give the G20 still more incentive to define and promote financial sector health broadly, and to consider the implications with respect to financial risk-taking.

So, it is true that global economic conditions are very precarious. Mohammed El Erian may well be right that we are at a critical "T juncture," where a wrong move, or lack of positive movement, could make recession all but inevitable. But there is also a lot of room for helpful G20 steps to achieve good if not perfect results, in part by reducing the enormous risk, uncertainty and fear that now burdens consumers, producers and investors. This is a test for the G20, and for China's important role as an emerging market leader. If the G20 can agree on concrete, effective, cooperative steps, we may finally see the end of this dismal period of economic gloom and doom, and less of the popular frustrations that appear to feed dangerous instability and extremism.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS, HOST: And the author of "Clinton Clash," Peter Schweizer, joins us now.

Thank you for joining us this morning, Peter.

You know, I was looking at the book jacket right here and you say that, here in the book jacket that your reporting raises serious and alarming questions about judgment of possible indebtedness to an array of foreign interests and ultimately, a fitness for high public office.

So how does your reporting show that Hillary Clinton may be unfit for the presidency?

PETER SCHWEIZER, AUTHOR, "CLINTON CLASH": Well, I think the real question here, George, is when you ever have an issue of the flow of funds to political candidates, whether that's to their campaigns, whether that's to private foundations, whether that's to their spouse, is there evidence of a pattern of -- of favorable decisions being made for those individuals?

And I think the -- the point that we make in the book is that there is a troubling pattern.

There are dozens of examples of that occurring.

Some people, I think particularly the Clinton camp, would say that these are all coincidence. I don't think, when you're talking about 12 instances, you're talking coincidence. I think you're talking trend.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But you take it pretty far. You write that, "The pattern of behavior is troubling enough to warrant further investigation by law enforcement (INAUDIBLE)."..

SCHWEIZER: Correct.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Do you have any evidence that a crime may have been committed?

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think it's -- if you look at a couple of recent examples. For example, Governor McConnell down in Virginia, or you look at Senator Menendez , in these cases, you didn't have evidence of a quid pro quo. What you had was funds flowing to elected officials, some of them gifts, some of them campaign contributions and actions that were being taken by those public officials that seemed to benefit the contributors.

Certainly, I think it warrants investigation. What that investigation will reveal, we'll see.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But a criminal investigation?

SCHWEIZER: Well, we'll see. I mean that's what the Governor McConnell has faced and that's what Menendez has faced.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But the...

SCHWEIZER: And I think the evidence here is far more widespread in terms of repeated action than there were in those two instances.

STEPHANOPOULOS: As you know, the Clinton campaign says you haven't produced a shred of evidence that there was any official action as secretary that -- that supported the interests of donors.

SCHWEIZER: Well...

STEPHANOPOULOS: We've done investigative work here at ABC News, found no proof of any kind of direct action. And an independent government ethics expert, Bill Allison, of the Sunline Foundation (ph), wrote this. He said, "There's no smoking gun, no evidence that she changed the policy based on donations to the foundation."

No smoking gun.

Is there a smoking gun?

SCHWEIZER: Yes. The smoking gun is in the pattern of behavior. And here's the analogy I would give you. It's a little bit like insider trading . I wrote a book on Congressional insider trading a couple of years ago and talked with prosecutors.

Most people that engage in criminal insider trading don't send an e-mail that says I've got inside information, buy this stock.

The way they look at it, they look at a pattern of stock trades. If the person has access to that information and then they do a series of well-timed trades. That warrants investigation.

I think the same thing applies here.

By the way, what's important to note is it was confirmed on Thursday, both by "The New York Times" and "The Wall Street Journal ," that there are multi-million dollar, non-disclosed donations that were made to the Clinton Foundation that were never disclosed by the Clintons.

This is a direct breach of an agreement they suggested with the White House.

STEPHANOPOULOS: That -- that is an issue for them, but it's not a criminal -- it's nothing that would warrant a cmii.

So let's look at some of the specifics behind your pattern.

SCHWEIZER: Sure.

STEPHANOPOULOS: A lot of focus on the sale of a company, Uranium One, to a -- to a Russian company. Of course, Frank Drisdra (ph), who had committed, what, a $130 million, a pledge to the Clinton Foundation back in 2006, had had an interest in this company.

But he actually sold it.

SCHWEIZER: Well, he sold his stock, but his firm, Endeavor Financial, continued to do finance deals well after that. And the individuals involved in the book, as you probably read, there are nine -- count them, nine major contributors to the Clinton Foundation who were involved in that nuclear deal.

The two individuals who were the financial advisers on the deal of the sale to the Russians, they're both major Clinton Foundation supporters. The chairman of that Foundation, Ian Telfer, whose donations were not disclosed, campaign -- and sorry, Clinton Foundation contributor. And there are others.

So this is not just about Frank Giustra. This is multiple layers (INAUDIBLE)...

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

STEPHANOPOULOS: OK, but you didn't disclose in your book that he had sold the interest.

SCHWEIZER: Yes.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Beyond that, this deal was approved by a -- a board of the government called the CFIUS Board.

SCHWEIZER: Correct.

STEPHANOPOULOS: This actually chaired by the secretary of the Treasury...

SCHWEIZER: Correct.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- not the secretary of State.

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Eight other agencies on board, the secretary of State, Homeland Security, Defense, Commerce...

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- Energy, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission...

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- signed off on it. And even though the State Department was one of nine agencies to sign off on it, there's no evidence at all that Hillary Clinton got directly involved in this decision.

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think it warrants further investigation. And there's a couple of things that need to be clarified.

Number one, she was one vote -- or the State Department was one vote on CFIUS. But any agency has veto power. So it needs to be unanimous. So they had to support this agreement.

The second thing that I would say is that in the midst of all of this, Hillary Clinton was in charge of the Russian reset. She was in charge of -- in -- of the A123 nuclear agreements with the Russians. She was the one that was meeting with Lavrov. There were four senior congressmen on national security issues that raised concerns about this issue...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But wait a second. There were nine different agencies...

SCHWEIZER: Sure.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- who approved it.

Doesn't that suggest that that was because there was no national security concern, not because of some nefarious influence by Hillary Clinton?

SCHWEIZER: But -- but look at the nine individuals that were on the CFIUS committee, the nine agencies represented.

Who was, by far, the most hawkish on CFIUS issues in the past?

Hillary Clinton. She was big on rejecting the Dubai ports deal. She was big on other issues. She sponsored legislation when she was in the Senate to straighten CFIUS.

This was a signature issue for her and this is totally out of character...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But the assistant secretary who sat -- the assistant secretary of State who sat on the committee said she never intervened on any CFIUS issue at all.

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think that deserves further scrutiny. I would question that.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To argue that (INAUDIBLE)...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But based on what?

Based on what?

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think based on her (INAUDIBLE)...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Do you have any evidence that she actually intervened in this issue?

SCHWEIZER: No, we don't have direct evidence. But it warrants further investigation because, again, George, this is part of the broader pattern. You either have to come to the conclusion that these are all coincidences or something else is afoot.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And that -- that is that -- the Clintons do say it's a coincidence. As they say, you have produced no evidence. And I still haven't heard any direct evidence and you just said you had no evidence that she intervened here.

But I do want to ask a broader question.

It's been reported that you -- you briefed several Republicans on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, including the chairman, Bob Corker.

Did you offer any briefings for Democrats?

SCHWEIZER: No, but I'd be glad to give them before the book is released. This was a -- a friend that asked me. He thought it would be a good idea to talk to these individuals. This was the committee that confirmed her.

And I was glad to meet with them. They did not get copies of the book. They did not get any material. It was simply a verbal briefing.

And I'd be glad to brief any Democrats before May 5th, when the book comes out.

STEPHANOPOULOS: As you know, the Democrats have said this is -- this is an indication of your partisan interest. They say...

SCHWEIZER: Well...

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- you used to work for President -- President Bush as a speechwriter. You're funded by the Koch brothers.

How do you respond to that?

SCHWEIZER: Well, George, what did I do when this book was completed?

I went to the investigative unit at "The New York Times," the investigative unit here at ABC. I went to the investigative unit at "The Washington Post." And I shared with them my findings, OK. These are not cupcakes. These are serious researchers and investigators.

And they are confirming what I've reported. So people can look at the facts and...

STEPHANOPOULOS: They haven't come -- they haven't confirmed any evidence of any crime.

SCHWEIZER: Well, but -- but it's not up to an author to prove crime. I mean do you think that when people first started looking at Governor McConnell or they started looking at Menendez, that they immediately had evidence?

You need subpoena power. You need access to records and information. You need access to e-mails.

There's all sorts of things that you can do. You can't leave it up to an author to say that an author has to prove a criminal case.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Finally, Bloomberg News is reporting that you're going to be looking into Jeb Bush's business dealings, as well.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Is that true?

What have you found?

Where and when will you publish?

SCHWEIZER: We've been working on it for about four months. We've been looking at land deals. We've been looking at an airport deal. We've been looking at some financial transactions involving hedge funds based out of the UK.

We have already reached out to several media outlets and we're going to adopt a similar model that we have here, which is to share that information with investigative journalists at established news outlets, share with them that information.

And I think that people will find it very, very interesting and compelling.

Peter Schweizer, thanks very much.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Thanks for having me, George.

Up next, the roundtable on this Hillary book and augways (ph) from the campaign trail.

Plus, same-sex marriage coming to the Supreme Court this week.

Bruce Jenner's big announcement puts transgender issues in the spotlight. We debate the next frontier in civil rights.

Politico: "Bill Clinton to sub for Hillary Clinton at Brown event"

By Maggie Haberman

September 30, 2014, 11:20 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton has bowed out of a fundraiser for Maryland gubernatorial hopeful Anthony Brown scheduled for Tuesday after the birth of her granddaughter — but Bill Clinton will be there in her place, it was reported Tuesday.

"I am very grateful to President Clinton for changing his schedule to travel to Maryland and attend our event this evening," Brown, Maryland's lieutenant governor, said in a statement to The Baltimore Sun. "I appreciate and respect Secretary Clinton's decision to stay and spend time with her daughter and new granddaughter, Charlotte. I appreciate both of the Clintons' commitment to the Brown-Ulman campaign."

Bill Clinton's appearance falls on the same day as two other events Hillary Clinton canceled, both in Washington — one a conference by the Congressional Hispanic Caucus Institute and the other a fundraiser for a New Hampshire state legislator.

Brown would become the third African-American official in the country to be elected governor, and could be a key surrogate for Hillary Clinton among black voters if she runs for president, as expected.

Baltimore Sun: "Hillary Clinton cancels Brown fundraising appearance, sends Bill Clinton"

By Erin Cox

September 30, 2014, 10:30 a.m. EDT

New grandmother and former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton has decided to stay home in New York with daughter Chelsea today, skipping a planned high-dollar fundraiser for Democratic Lt. Gov. Anthony G. Brown.

Instead, former President Bill Clinton will headline the event in her place.

"I am very grateful to President Clinton for changing his schedule to travel to Maryland and attend our event this evening," Lt. Gov. Anthony G. Brown said in a statement. "I appreciate and respect Secretary Clinton's decision to stay and spend time with her daughter and new granddaughter, Charlotte. I appreciate both of the Clintons' commitment to the Brown-Ulman campaign."

This will be the second fundraiser Bill Clinton has attended for Brown. The last one in May raised nearly $1 million for the Democrat's bid. Campaign organizers expected tonight's event at a wooded, 2.8-acre private home in Potomact to raise even more.

The Clintons curtailed their busy election season schedules after Charlotte was born Friday. Bill Clinton has long been scheduled to headline a fundraiser in North Carolina today for the re-election of U.S. Sen. Kay Hagan, a first-term Democrat.

This morning, Clinton added a stop in Maryland to his schedule accommodate the Brown fundraiser, Brown's campaign said.

Public Policy Polling: "Iowa Senate race remains close, slight edge to Ernst"

[No Writer Mentioned]

September 30, 2014

PPP's newest Iowa Senate poll continues to find a tight race with Joni Ernst slightly ahead of Bruce Braley. Ernst is ahead 44/42 when all the third party candidates are included, and 45/43 in a straight head to head. The 45/43 advantage for Ernst is identical to what we found on our last poll of the race in late August.

Even though the horse race numbers haven't changed much, this is the first time we've found Ernst with a better net favorability rating than Braley. Ernst is at -4 with 42% of voters rating her favorably to 46% with a negative opinion, numbers that are up from a -10 spread at 36/46 in August. Meanwhile Braley's numbers continue their slow decline- he has a -7 rating with 37% rating him favorably and 44% holding an unfavorable opinion, down from -4 at 37/41 last month. Braley's favorability has dropped a net 17 points from where it was when we first polled a Braley/Ernst match up in July of 2013 and he was at +10 (34/24).

Both candidates have a pretty good lock on their party base. Only 5% of Democrats are crossing over to support Ernst, and just 8% of Republicans are crossing over to support Braley. The key for Ernst is with independent voters- she has a 45/35 advantage with them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Governor's race in Iowa does not appear to be making any move towards being competitive. Terry Branstad leads Jack Hatch 50/36 with the full field of candidates and 52/38 in a straight head to head. Branstad is up 20 points with independents at 51/31, and is winning over 17% of the Democratic vote while losing just 6% of Republicans. The horse race numbers pretty closely track with Branstad's approval numbers at 53/38. Feelings about Hatch are divided three ways with about a third rating him favorably, a third unfavorably, and a third having no opinion either way.

The closest race down ballot continues to be the one for Secretary of State. Republican Paul Pate leads Democrat Brad Anderson 36/33, with 25% of voters remaining undecided. Also in the range of being competitive is the race for Auditor- Republican Mary Mosiman has a 41/35 advantage over Democratic challenger Jonathan Neiderbach there.

The other three statewide contests don't appear they'll be competitive this year. Democrat Tom Miller leads 53/33 for reelection as Attorney General, Republican Bill Northey is up 49/29 in his bid for another term as Agriculture Commissioner, and Michael Fitzgerald has a 47/35 advantage in his run at keeping the Treasurer's job.

Other notes from Iowa:

-Charles Grassley remains easily the state's most popular politician with 57% of voters approving of him to only 29% who disapprove. He would lead a hypothetical reelection contest against former Governor Tom Vilsack (also generally popular with a 46/36 favorability rating) 51/42. Tom Harkin is on positive ground with a +10 net approval rating at 47/37 as well. The only states besides Iowa in recent years where we've found the Governor and both Senators in a state all with +10 net approval ratings are Mississippi and Wyoming.

-Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush are tied in a hypothetical 2016 match up in Iowa at 43%. Clinton leads the rest of the Republican field by 4-8 points. It's 45/41 over Chris Christie, 46/42 over Mike Huckabee, 47/42 over Rand Paul, and 47/39 over Ted Cruz. We'll have early numbers on who Democrats and Republicans want as their 2016 nominees tomorrow.

New York Times: "Mitt Isn't Ready to Call It Quits"

By Mark Leibovich

September 30, 2014

"Hey, Ann, can you come here a sec?" Mitt Romney called out, sinking into the cushions of a walnut-colored easy chair, his legs outstretched on a matching ottoman. Romney's blue work shirt was tucked into faded jeans; sockless ankles peeked out from his New Balance sneakers. He paused as Ann Romney entered from the kitchen, where she was baking chocolate-chip cookies. "Sweetie," he continued, "what are some of the items we gave away at the Yankee swap?"

It was a September morning, and the Romneys were closing up their summer house in Wolfeboro, N.H. The place, which is vast and uncluttered, had a decidedly empty-nester vibe. Framed family photos were clustered on shelves; half-packed bags were strewn around the kitchen. The silence in the living room was accentuated by the distant whine of motorboats on Lake Winnipesaukee. After years of traveling entourages, the Romneys now live alone. There were no staff members or aides or handlers; no phones rang. Nothing announced the presence of an almost-president, other than a sign on the porch: "Ann and Mitt Romney: Tennis, Volleyball, Water-Sports." A single Cadillac SRX was parked in the driveway as a flock of geese orbited overhead. "Darn geese," Romney said, "keep pooping all over the lawn."

The Romneys are in downsizing mode. They have sold their Belmont, Mass., townhouse, and they also might sell the villa in La Jolla, Calif., which they purchased for $12 million in 2008 — the one with the zoning and renovation troubles, the disdainful Democratic neighbors and the much-derided plans for a car elevator. On a lark, they recently decided to make their permanent home in Utah, where they are building a house adjacent to one of their five sons' 2.5-acre property.

The relocation has not been without its practical concerns. When you run for president twice, you tend to accumulate huge amounts of campaign souvenirs, gifts and other detritus. However elusive the ultimate prize, the trunkloads of consolation trophies endure: There are the plaques, the awards and the occasional engraved glass eagle (“I got it for a speech or something”). Then there are the homemade portraits of the candidate, sent in by supporters. The Romneys have also saved 22 of each campaign T-shirt, button and poster — one for each of their grandchildren. From Ann’s $1,000-a-plate birthday luncheon in April 2012, they have saved the cake topping of her on horseback that was commissioned by Donald Trump.

Had the election turned out differently, these tokens might have found a nice home in some government facility, en route to a presidential library. Instead, Romney was forced to cram them into his garage in Wolfeboro. When he began to worry that the snowy winters would foster mold, he loaded what he could into a horse trailer and paid a guy named Poppy to drive it across the country. Before he left, the Romneys hosted a giveaway party, or Yankee swap, for the things they didn’t want.

“What about that elephant purse?” Ann said, arriving from the kitchen in a light blue blouse and jeans. “Did you mention the elephant purse?”

“Ah, the elephant purse,” Mitt said, nodding. A very nice woman had given it to him, perhaps in Iowa, or maybe Ohio or Nevada. “She made it with that puff paint,” Mitt said. “It had those, what do you call them, bedazzle beads.” Ron Kaufman, a longtime adviser, snared this particular keepsake at the Yankee swap.

“Very appropriate,” Ann said. “Ron is the king of tchotchkes.”

“The best was the bust of Ronald Reagan,” Romney continued. “It was plaster but bronzed. Or it looked like it was bronzed. It said, ‘Governor Mitt Romney, the Reagan Freedom Award,’ or something of that nature.” His tone had hardened a little, acquiring the edge of a sarcastic boast. “I actually have several busts of Ronald Reagan that have been presented to me,” he said. Then the room fell silent as Ann returned to the kitchen to set out a small buffet of sliced turkey, corned beef, two loaves of Pepperidge Farm bread (white and wheat) and a selection of both mayonnaise and Miracle Whip. Romney, sinking back in his chair, looked out the window as more geese flew by.

After losing the presidential election to Barack Obama in 2012, Romney expected to become a political empty-nester of sorts — a “loser for life,” as he predicted in “Mitt,” the Netflix documentary about his two presidential campaigns. (“Mike Dukakis, you know, he can’t get a job mowing lawns,” he remarked at the time.) Unlike John McCain and John Kerry, Romney didn’t have a job to return to in the Senate. Unlike Al Gore, he had already amassed extraordinary wealth. Romney, who is 67, was left to confront the vacuum of a long retirement, come what may.

Being the first nominee to nurse his defeat fully in the social-media age brought its own indignities. Gore could go away and grow a beard, then get rich, fat and separated from his wife, all in relative obscurity. Romney, by contrast, has posed dutifully for Instagram photos with commercial-airline companions (“airports are the worst”), supermarket employees and staff members at Wahoo’s Fish Taco. He briefly inspired a hashtag, #SelfiesWithMitt. Recently he was taking an early-morning jog in Arkansas, where he was campaigning for the Republican gubernatorial candidate, Asa Hutchinson, when a woman accosted him. “You’re John Kerry! You’re John Kerry!” she yelled. He tried to correct her, but she wasn’t buying it; she kept running alongside him. “I said, ‘I’m not John Kerry — I’m Tom Brady,’ ” Romney recalled. At that, she left him alone.

As a candidate, Romney often appeared as if he were bracing for a light fixture to drop on his head. On this September morning, though, he seemed far more at ease. No doubt some of his buoyancy could be ascribed to a postdefeat surge of popularity. G.O.P. candidates had been begging him to campaign and raise money for them; polls had found that he would defeat Obama in a rerun of 2012. A number of Romney’s seemingly askew assertions during the campaign — like identifying Russia as the United States’ greatest geopolitical threat — now looked prescient. An online “Draft Mitt” petition had already accumulated more than 120,000 votes of support.

Romney shrugged off the recent attention, citing the natural human tendency to covet the unavailable. (“If you live in the mountains, you long for the trees and the lakes,” he said. “If you live in the trees and the lakes. . . .”) And yet a confluence of political realities has created a genuine opening for a Romney third act. As Obama struggles through a difficult final term, there is a lack of a clear Republican heir apparent. Presumptive early front-runners, like Chris Christie and Jeb Bush, have shown themselves to be flawed or reluctant or both. A splintering of possible movement candidates (Rand Paul, Ted Cruz) could beget a need for a default consensus choice.

Romney, for his part, is noticeably playing along. He recently told a radio host that he was not planning on running for president but allowed that “circumstances can change.” A recent column by the conservative pundit Byron York noted that Romney had kept in close contact with many of his advisers and aides. As we spoke, Romney compared the barrage of 2016-related questions to a scene in the film “Dumb and Dumber.” After Jim Carrey’s character is flatly rejected by Lauren Holly, she tells him that there’s a one-in-a-million chance she would change her mind. “So,” Romney told me, embodying the character, “Jim Carrey says, ‘You’re telling me there’s a chance.’ ”

This was the obvious opening for me to ask if there was a chance. Romney’s response was decidedly meta — “I have nothing to add to the story” — but he then fell into the practiced political parlance of nondenial. “We’ve got a lot of people looking at the race,” he said. “We’ll see what

As deftly as Romney plays the self-deprecating bridesmaid, he is open about his dread of becoming irrelevant. After his father, George Romney, a three-term Michigan governor, lost the state's primary in 1968, he struggled to get meetings. "I remember my dad becoming quite frustrated," Romney said. "He used to say that Washington is the fastest place to go from 'Who's Who' to 'Who's That?' " In the saturated media landscape of today, the son has been luckier. "I have been able to get on TV, get key interviews, get op-eds published," Romney said. When I showed up in Wolfeboro, as Romney led me to the living room, he made sure we were on the record. "You have a tape recorder? Notebook?" he asked me as he was describing the potential mold problems of New Hampshire storage. He wanted to make sure I got this.

Romney also seemed eager to put much less frivolous points on the record. He spoke dismissively about his visit to the White House shortly after the 2012 election — the cursory meeting in which the former combatants are supposed to play gracious, take pictures together and make noises about issues on which they might work together in the future. "It was intended to check a box," Romney said of the president's invitation. He was not offered any follow-up, which was typical, Romney said, according to what he heard from some of his executive friends. "No one gets the impression that what they are saying is being incorporated," he told me. "I won't mention who it was, but I met with one of the nation's top Republican leaders, and he said, 'You know the strange thing is that the president seems to answer to only two people — Valerie Jarrett and Michelle Obama.' "

Romney derided Obama for his continual complaints about Republican intransigence. "That's the nature of democracy," he said, shaking his head with an exaggerated grimace. He contrasted this with the exemplary bipartisan record of, for instance, himself. When he was governor of Massachusetts, Romney reminded me, he always worked with the state's liberal stalwart, Ted Kennedy. "Ted Kennedy would do the work," Romney said, in contrast to the state's other longtime senator. "John Kerry was always in front of the camera but not out doing the hard work." He called Hillary Clinton an "enabler" of Obama's foreign policy and said he was concerned by the isolationist inclination of likely Republican presidential candidates like Rand Paul. Romney told me that he was more passionate about foreign affairs than he showed in the 2012 campaign, which was largely given over to domestic affairs. It went without saying that this probably wouldn't be the case in 2016.

"Mitt," which was released in January, portrayed the candidate as a family man — vulnerable, funny and cognizant of the absurdity of his undertaking. "One of the big frustrations a lot of us had on the campaign is that people weren't seeing the guy we all know in private," said Representative Paul Ryan, Romney's running mate in 2012, offering a familiar complaint. "The 'Mitt' documentary was a very good picture of that guy." I asked Ryan if the film's warm portrayal might argue for a looser, less scripted approach to campaigns. "The pressure you get from the consultant class to conform to the norm and do these stock standard things drives me nuts, personally," he said.

When I asked Romney the same question, however, he said the exact opposite. "There will be no free time in the back of the plane where you'd just go back and shoot the breeze with the media," he told me. He would do this occasionally, but his aides argued against it. "They were always afraid that, you know, I'd make some little joke or someone would ask some question that couldn't be answered — you know, 'When did you stop beating your wife?' " Romney told me that during the campaign, the F.B.I. informed him that a foreign government — he wouldn't say which — was reading his emails. This was another reminder that there could be no safe zone, no such thing as an unplugged candidate. "The era of spontaneity in politics is over," he declared, as I immediately wondered when it had started.

"I was talking to one of my political advisers," Romney continued, "and I said: 'If I had to do this again, I'd insist that you literally had a camera on me at all times" — essentially employing his own tracker, as opposition researchers call them. "I want to be reminded that this is not off the cuff." This, as he saw it, was what got him in trouble at that Boca Raton fund-raiser, when Romney told the crowd he was writing off the 47 percent of the electorate that supported Obama (a.k.a. "those people"; "victims" who take no "personal responsibility"). Romney told me that the statement came out wrong, because it was an attempt to placate a rambling supporter who was saying that Obama voters were essentially deadbeats.

"My mistake was that I was speaking in a way that reflected back to the man," Romney said. "If I had been able to see the camera, I would have remembered that I was talking to the whole world, not just the man." I had never heard Romney say that he was prompted into the "47 percent" line by a ranting supporter. It was also impossible to ignore the phrase "If I had to do this again."

Romney's camera-at-all-times plan, however, reflected his own limitations as a candidate. By the same token, it was quite an indictment that "Mitt" — made by a little-known filmmaker on a shoestring — created a more palatable rendering of Romney than his campaign, which spent hundreds of millions on genius operatives and image makers. Romney, for his part, seemed to understand this. No matter how content he appeared, when the conversation turned to his disappointment in losing, his voice dropped. "It really kills me," he said. "It really kills me." He became inaudible, and it seemed as if he might tear up.

As if to rescue him, Ann called out from the kitchen that lunch was ready. Mitt remained in the living room, now staring at the floor. "The consequences of my loss are very clear to me and to a lot of people," he said. "And that's really hard." His voice dropped to nearly a whisper, before he caught himself and quickly pivoted. "Let's get a sandwich!" he bellowed.

Following behind, I informed the defending Republican nominee that I would now be turning off my tape recorder and that he could relax. “Oh,” he said, “you can keep recording.”

Mark Leibovich is the magazine’s chief national correspondent and the author of the forthcoming book “Citizens of the Green Room.”

BuzzFeed: “The ‘Totally Ridiculous’ Romney Boomlet”

By Ben Smith

September 30, 2014, 12:15 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Kristol is queasy. This is not a thing.

There’s only one false note in Mark Leibovich’s wonderful visit to Mitt Romney’s quite nice new life, in which the former Republican nominee — rather than having the letter “L” for “loser” branded on his forehead — is enjoying the low-level celebrity of airport selfies and ongoing flattery of sycophants who say they want him to run for president.

The false note: “a confluence of political realities has created a genuine opening for a Romney third act.”

There are a few people who think this is the case: true Romney loyalists and believers, Republicans like Emil Henry, Robert O’Brien, and Hugh Hewitt, who just love the guy and write about it in Politico. They are all but family; I’m not sure what the actual family thinks. Members of his former political staff — people who talk to Romney regularly, and regard him highly — saidTuesday morning that they didn’t actually think he’d run, and viewed it, at best, as not a great idea. Indeed, some of his real admirers (and most people who worked for Romney do admire him) were trying out their eye-rolls Tuesday morning at this feeblest of boomlets.

This is, they say, not a thing.

“I respect Romney, but have the queasy feeling that Romney ‘16 would be a reprise of Dewey ‘48,” Weekly Standard editor and former Romney champion Bill Kristol said in an email.

One top former Romney aide, who likes and respects Romney and thinks he would make a great president, agreed to speak on the condition of not being named or identified, and to outline the broad sense in what’s left of Romneyworld.

“It’s ridiculous — totally ridiculous,” the former aide said.

The core flaw is a kind of cluelessness about how this is going to work, a bit of wishful thinking indulged by a handful of donors who love Romney — but not actually much on the minds of the top Republican fundraisers now thinking about Paul and Cruz, Rubio and Bush, and the other more plausible candidates for president.

“Here’s the problem with the theory of the Romney candidacy, as much as I love the guy and as much as I think he’d be a good president,” the former aide began. “The problem with the way these [Romney donors and friends] are treating a potential Romney candidacy is that they act as though Romney, if he were to get into the race, picks up where he gets off. As though, because he was the last Republican nominee, he’s still the Republican nominee unless he decides to bequeath it to someone else.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The field is not going to be nearly as weak as it was last time and nobody in the field, including the potential establishment candidates — Jeb or Chris Christie or Scott Walker — believe they should step aside for Mitt Romney," the former aide predicted. "So Romney gets into the race and he's suddenly competing with heavy-duty candidates who have as much claim on the mainstream donor base as he does, and suddenly he's in a messy primary where these people will be going at him in a very nasty way."

And here is the thing that Leibovich's piece really gets at: Mitt Romney has been surprised by his life since the defeat. He predicted he'd be branded a "loser for life" after 2012, his name — like Mike Dukakis' — synonymous with defeat. Instead, he's regarded with warmth, if not passion, by people who still think he would have made a decent president, and don't all blame him for blowing it.

"I think Romney really likes where he is right now," said the former aide. "He's saying, 'Wow — I ran and I lost and I'm still held in high esteem' … He's really taken aback by that. He wants to bottle that."

And to run would, probably, be to give that up for good.

"Wouldn't it be truly pathetic if on his third time he doesn't even win the nomination?" asked the former aide. "Then he does have the 'L' and he's truly truly a diminished figure.

"I think he personally has thought that through more than the people who are pushing him to run."

Associated Press: "Eying 2016, Rand Paul Courts Young Voters"

By Steve Peoples

September 30, 2014, 3:00 a.m. EDT

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul is working to improve the Republican Party's image among young voters as he visits South Carolina, a key state in the presidential primary calendar.

The tea party favorite, who hopes to strengthen his national network ahead of a likely White House bid, was set to appear at the University of South Carolina and at the College of Charleston on Tuesday before addressing the Horry County GOP.

Paul says the Republican Party has a big opportunity to attract more young voters - a group that fueled President Barack Obama's success and could prove critical to Hillary Rodham Clinton should she seek the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016. Polls suggest Obama's standing with younger voters has slipped significantly in recent months.

"Young people aren't so wedded to party," Paul, 51, said in an interview with The Associated Press. "The kids are probably adrift somewhat. And I don't think someone who is an authoritarian, or comes from a much more authoritarian point of view like Hillary Clinton, will attract them."

While the next presidential primary season won't begin in earnest until next year, Paul already has established himself as among the most active prospective candidates. His South Carolina visit marks his fourth appearance in the state this year, according to his office. But he disputed a recent report that he had decided to seek the presidency as long as his wife agreed.

"There has been no final decision," Paul said, noting that his wife's support is "a big part" of that decision. "But you can tell obviously by my travels and by the people who have come to work for our organization that there is an interest. We're not sitting passively by and doing nothing. We're building a nationwide organization."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Perhaps best known for his libertarian positions on civil liberties and foreign policy, Paul is casting himself as an anti-establishment conservative eager to repair what he called the Republican Party's "tattered" image.

He is critical of the GOP's push to require voters to present photo identification at the polls and reduce early voting in some states, moves criticized as efforts to suppress participation by minority voters who typically support Democrats. Republican-led legislatures in North Carolina and South Carolina in recent years passed Voter ID laws that were challenged by the Justice Department as discriminatory.

Paul said he doesn't think Republicans are trying to suppress the minority vote, but acknowledged that many African-Americans believe that to be the case.

"I've cautioned Republicans, `You need to be aware of peoples' perceptions,'" he said. "If the perception is out there, why don't you start talking about something good, like restoring peoples' right to vote?"

Paul is scheduled to spend Wednesday campaigning alongside Senate candidate Thom Tillis in North Carolina, where the Republican-led legislature has voted to limit early voting and end same-day voter registration.

"I think it's a dumb idea to spend a lot of time on Republicans trying to change early voting," Paul said, citing a similar law in Texas. "My position is I want more people to vote, not less."

MAJOR DOMESTIC INITIATIVES

Alliance for a Healthier Generation

The Alliance conducted a satellite media tour with Billy Blanks and Tara Stiles to showcase the Fit for a Healthier Generation campaign aimed at making kids more active in schools. The tour reached more than 20 million people across the country.

24 Hour Fitness and Cigna have signed on to the Alliance's Healthcare Initiative and will offer their employees and employer groups, respectively, extended visits to primary care practitioners and covered visits to registered dietitians.

Clinton Health Matters Initiative

CHMI will meet with the PGA Tour later this week to finalize details on launching the CHMI community program in the Greater Jacksonville area.

CHMI met with Commissioner Kelly's team last week to discuss the details of the event on prescription drug abuse and further collaboration. Due to scheduling constraints, the event will take place in the spring on an NYC campus. Meanwhile, CHMI will be working with the NYPD to convene NYC college and university presidents to discuss ways in which these campuses can educate their students on the dangers of prescription drugs and the mixing of these drugs with other substances.

Clinton Economic Opportunity Initiative

CEO met with Kevin Langley, the former Global Chairman of the Entrepreneurs Organization (EO), to discuss possible partnership opportunities between EO and CEO. The Entrepreneurs' Organization (EO) is a global business network of over 8,000 business owners in 122 chapters and 35 countries. Conversation centered upon the possibility of leveraging EO's New York and New Orleans chapters to create a small business event geared towards providing much needed advice and support to small business owners who were still in the midst of dealing with the damages brought on by Hurricane Sandy. Kevin was able to give valuable advice and emotional support to EO member and former EMP mentee Victor Chan, a small business owner whose business survived Hurricane Katrina. Kevin counseled Victor on how best to keep his South Street Seaport area restaurant business alive amidst a host of financing and real estate issues that have threatened to put him out of business. CEO will be continuing exploratory conversations with EO around how EO New Orleans entrepreneurs could be leveraged in a similar manner to support NYC area small business owners impacted by Hurricane Sandy.

Inc. magazine is currently working to gain internal approvals on two possible collaboration opportunities: 1) integration of CEO's Entrepreneur Mentoring Program into the Inc. Business Owner Council in the form of a new business accelerator program and 2) a Women's Summit in collaboration with the Clinton Foundation.

Malawi

The trees project is being reviewed by a large purchaser of carbon credits in Scandinavia for a potential major purchase commitment (up to 40,000 tons per year). COTAP, the carbon credits broker in the US that is aiming to be the Kiva of carbon credits, has made over $3,700 in sales of Trees of Hope credits to individual buyers in the few months since signing a marketing agreement with CDI. Bank accounts have been established for Trees of Hope farmers who will be receiving their first payments from carbon sales.

CDI is working on finalizing the long-term lease agreement for the commercial farms. Discussions have begun with John McAslan on developing a master site plan for the commercial farms to help guide renovation and construction of needed infrastructure after leases are in place.

Rwanda

CDI has approached some technical schools and universities to recruit their best students for factory jobs at Mount Meru Soyco Ltd. They will conduct interviews in February and those selected will be sent to a factory in Arusha for a three-month training in March. The Soyco factory is preparing to begin buying raw materials from farmers.

Regarding the AGRA project, all crops are maturing on the field and the team hopes to begin the harvest and mobilize more farmers for the coming season by the end of this month. The CDI team has begun doing field days in the three Districts of the project area—Kayonza District, Kirehe District and Gatsibo District.

CDI has also been supporting the rehabilitation of the ISAR (Institut des Sciences Agronomiques du Rwanda) microbiology lab to be able to produce more inoculums. The lab has bought new equipment with CDI's support.

Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative

Peru

CGSGI's cataract surgery program has reached 49, 646 surgeries. The 50,000 cataracts surgery goal is expected to be met by the end of February.

CGSGI is finalizing an MOU with the Peru's Ministry of Tourism to begin capacity building necessary to link small suppliers in Cusco, Peru with that region's hospitality and restaurant sector. The project is expected to launch in March.

Colombia

The Acceso Fund has agreed to capitalize a new Supply Chain Impact Enterprise in Cartagena, Colombia with USD $2.1 million. This enterprise is expected to begin operations in April and will procure agricultural products and seafood from local suppliers for resale to the hospitality, restaurant and supermarket markets along Colombia's caribbean coast. The business will provide distribution, warehousing, processing and logistics for the suppliers reducing the costs to both suppliers and buyers and creating opportunities for low income suppliers in the region to broaden their market opportunity and substantially increase their incomes. This is the second new enterprise capitalized by Acceso in Cartagena. The first, a hospitality labor training center, will start its first class in March.

Clinton Global Initiative

Annual Meeting

CGI currently has 127 paying members registered for the 2013 Annual Meeting. Of the total number of registrants, 106 are renewals, 61 fewer than last year at this time, and 21 are new, 9 more than last year at this time. CGI will contact each prior member who has not yet renewed over the next couple of weeks.

The United Postcode Lotteries has renewed its sponsorship for the 2013 Annual Meeting and increased from last year's amount of €300,000 euro to €400,000 euro.

CGI University

January 30 was the final application deadline for CGI U. A record number of applications was received from 3976 students, representing 136 countries and all 50 states.

32 colleges have formally joined the newly-created CGI University Network, committing a total of $357,000 in travel stipends and seed funding for student commitment-makers from their respective campuses.
Sponsorship of CGI U currently stands at $950,000.

Commitments

The Energy & Ecosystems Track has split into two distinct tracks: the Energy Track and the Environmental Stewardship Track.

Upcoming Convenings

Eighteen mayors have officially agreed to participate in the Infrastructure Finance for Cities Task Force, co-led by CGI and the US Conference of Mayors. They represent the cities of Atlanta, Baltimore, Charlotte, Chicago, Denver, Houston, Indianapolis, Jacksonville, Louisville, Los Angeles, Mesa, New Orleans, Oakland, Oklahoma City, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Redmond, and San Francisco. The Task Force will begin work this month and culminate at CGI America in June.

Additional convenings in February include:

- Best Practices in Employee Engagement (2/8/2013)
- Impact Investing: State of the Market (2/11/2013)
- Arts & Development in Post-Conflict Communities: Why the Arts Matter for Resilient Societies (2/19/2013)
- CGI Winter Meeting (2/20/2013)
- Integrating Women-Owned Businesses in Supply Chains: A Commitment Workshop (2/21/2013)
- Haiti Action Network (2/27/2013)

'Clinton Cash' author says no "direct evidence" of wrongdoing

Updated 10:11 AM ET, Sun April 26, 2015
http://www.cnn.com/2015/04/26/politics/schweizer-clinton-cash/

Washington (CNN)The author of a book alleging that some donors to the Clinton Foundation received favors while Hillary Clinton was secretary of state said Sunday that he did not have "direct evidence" of any impropriety, but argued the "pattern of behavior" required an investigation into Clinton's record.

Peter Schweizer claims in a forthcoming book, "Clinton Cash," that contributors to Clinton's family foundation had undue influence on American foreign policy. But when pressed by the host of ABC's "This Week," George Stephanopoulos, Schweizer said the record is only suggestive, not definitive.

"The smoking gun is in the pattern of behavior," Schweizer said, comparing his findings to previous research he did on insider trading. "Most people that engage in criminal insider trading don't send an email and say, 'I've got inside information -- buy this stock.' "

Even though Schweizer admitted he had no hard proof of any quid-pro-quos, he did raise several instances when he said Clinton foundation supporters benefited from State Department actions. And the author noted that several media outlets have begun to follow up on his reporting by dispatching their own investigative reporters to confirm and expand on his findings.

Schweizer said his role was merely to lay the groundwork for a broader probe by authorities.

"It's not up to an author to prove crime," he said.

Schweizer is also currently reporting on potential ethics violations by Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor likely to seek the Republican nomination.

Subject: [big campaign] NSN VP Debate National Security Fact Check

Summarzing the VP Foreign Policy Questions
Posted by Ilan Goldenberg

1. Palin mispronounced our commander in Afghanistan, Dave McKiernan's name and also claimed that he supported the idea of using the Iraq surge as a model for Afghanistan even though just yesterday he said he did not.

2. In response to a question on Iran and Pakistan Palin answered by starting to talk about Iraq. Similar to McCain's obsession on Iraq with complete neglect for all other national security priorities.

3. Palin promised that the Middle East peace process would be a top priority for a McCain administration. But McCain's own advisors last week said that it wouldn't.

4. Palin was unable to distinguish any specific difference between Bush and McCain on any foreign policy issues. Joe Biden made that point very clearly.

5. Sarah Palin seems to rely quite heavily on her notes and on a very limited set of talking points. She has been dodging questions all night long.

Does Palin understand the meaning of deterrent?
Posted by The Editors

This is a post from NSN intern Eric Auner

Palin just said that nuclear weapons are currently being used as a deterrent. The only problem is that this was said in response to a question on the circumstances under which the weapons would actually be fired. The meaning of the deterrent is that they might, at some point, be fired. If you are unclear about what that point is, then the deterrent is meaningless.

Petraeus and McKiernan say no surge in Afghanistan
Posted by Max Bergmann

This week General McKiernan, the top commander in Afghanistan, and General David Petraeus made an obvious point: "Afghanistan is not Iraq."

Both insisted that the challenges in Afghanistan are very different than the ones in Iraq and therefore require a very different strategy and approach. McKiernan said "What I don't think is needed - the word I don't use in Afghanistan is the word surge" and General Petraeus explained that every situation is "unique." This is in stark contrast to the approach advocated by Senator McCain, who has insisted on applying the same "surge" plan that was adopted in Iraq to Afghanistan.

At last Friday's debate McCain said, "the same strategy that he [Obama] condemned in Iraq. It's going to have to be employed in Afghanistan." In July, McCain said "the surge in Iraq shows us the way to succeed in Afghanistan." It is not surprising that McCain would mistakenly conflate Iraq and Afghanistan, since he and his fellow conservatives have paid little attention to the war in Afghanistan. McCain didn't offer his "surge" plan for Afghanistan until late this summer and at the Republican National Convention last month, no major speaker even mentioned the word Afghanistan. As the situation continues to deteriorate in Afghanistan, the United States needs to adopt the comprehensive plan that progressives have been advocating the past few years.

Israel on the Back Burner
Posted by Patrick Barry

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Governor Palin claimed that promoting an Arab-Israeli peace deal would be at the top of the agenda for John McCain's administration. It's fine, even laudable to make a claim like that, but when it directly conflicts with statements from one of your key advisors, Max Boot, who just said a few weeks ago that bringing peace to Israel would not be a big priority for McCain, you begin to wonder about who controls the policy in John McCain's camp.

Biden hits the mark. McCain's foreign policies are no different than Bush. In the rare cases that they are, such on North Korea, they are more extreme.

Meetings
Posted by James Lamond

If Barack Obama's decision to meet with Iran, North Korea, and Cuba is so dangerous and naive, then how does she explain the Bush administration's current negotiations with North Korea, and both Republican and Democrat Secretaries of State saying we should negotiate with Iran:

- Henry Kissinger, Jim Baker, Colin Powell, Madeleine Albright and Warren Christopher all agree we need direct talks with Iran without pre-conditions. Henry Kissinger, former Secretary of State under Presidents Nixon and Ford, not only indicated that he "was in favor of negotiating with Iran," but said that such negotiations should occur "without conditions," and should begin at a high level." Former Clinton Secretary of State Madeleine Albright advised that "You need to engage with countries you have problems with," and said "I believe we need to engage with Iran." Colin Powell, Secretary of State under George W. Bush echoed the need for negotiations stating: "Let's get together and talk about nuclear weapons." [AP, 9/15/08. ABC News, 9/15/08. Reuters, 9/16/08.]

- The Bipartisan Iraq Study Group believes the US should have direct talks with Iran. "Given the ability of Iran and Syria to influence events within Iraq and their interest in avoiding chaos in Iraq, the United States should try to engage them constructively. In seeking to influence the behavior of both countries, the United States has disincentives and incentives available." [Iraq Study Group, 12/06]

- Even the Bush administration is moving toward Senator Obama's strategy of diplomatic engagement with Iran. The Bush Administration is beginning to embrace a number of foreign policy positions favored by Senator Obama. "On a range of major foreign policy issues over the past year, Bush has pursued strategies and actions very much along the lines of what Sen. Obama has advocated during his presidential race." "On the diplomatic front, Obama has made a point of advocating dialogue with Iran" and though he has been vilified by conservatives for it, "in July, Bush sent a high-level U.S. emissary to attend nuclear talks with Iran" In June, the Washington Post reported that "Senior officials at the State Department and beyond are mulling a proposal to open an interest section in Tehran, similar to the one the United States has operated in Havana since 1977." [Washington Post, 9/15/08. Washington Post, 6/23/08]

Talking to allies
Posted by Max Bergmann

Palin just said that her and John McCain were in favor of diplomacy. But what does that mean? Does McCain agree with Kissinger's position which is in favor of talking at the Secretary of State level with the Iranians? McCain and Palin say they do and then they attack Obama and Biden for wanting to talk to the Iranians. They are all over the place.

The fact is that the McCain-Palin position of continuing the George Bush policy is indefensible and will only result in a nuclear armed Iran.

Palin Supports Debunked McCain Plan for Afghanistan
Posted by Patrick Barry

Palin just repeated John McCain's claim that the surge strategy from Iraq could be successfully implemented in Afghanistan. Yet in the past two days alone, the two members of the military working more closely on Afghanistan than anyone fundamentally disagreed with the McCain-Palin plan:

U.S. Commanders rebuff McCain's vision for the war in Afghanistan. Speaking in Washington yesterday General David McKiernan, head of the NATO-led coalition in Afghanistan and former head of ground forces in Iraq, rejected McCain's plan for Afghanistan. McKiernan argued that more troops "are urgently required to combat a worsening insurgency, but he stated emphatically that no Iraq-style 'surge' of forces will end the conflict there." While McCain has often said that he wants to apply the same surge strategy in Afghanistan as in Iraq, the commanding general clearly stated "Afghanistan is not Iraq." General David Petraeus, now the head of CENTCOM and former commander in Iraq said, "People often ask, 'What did you learn from Iraq that might be transferable to Afghanistan?'The first lesson, the first caution really, is that every situation like this is truly and absolutely unique, and has its own context and specifics and its own texture." [Washington Post, 10/2/08. New York Times, 10/1/08]

Afghanistan's strategic puzzle will not be solved by a surge in troops alone. NATO-ISAF commander General David McKiernan outlined Afghanistan's many challenges that cannot be addressed purely by an influx of troops: "A country that has very harsh geography. It's very difficult to move around, getting back to our reliance on helicopters. It's a country with very few natural resources, as opposed to the oil revenues that [Iraq] has. There's very little money to be generated in terms of generated in Afghanistan. The literacy rate - you have a literate society in Iraq, you have a society that has a history of producing civil administrators, technocrats, middle class that are able to run the country in Iraq. You do not have that in Afghanistan. So there are a lot of challenges. What I don't think is needed - the word that I don't use in Afghanistan is the word 'surge.' There needs to be a sustained commitment of a variety of military and non-military resources, I believe." Today's piece in the New York Times, covering Afghanistan's debilitating opium trade, which funds insurgents and produces instability, further demonstrates why a military solution alone will not be sufficient in Afghanistan. [General David McKiernan, Washington Independent, 10/1/08 . NY Times, 10/02/08]

No plan
Posted by Max Bergmann

McCain has never laid out a plan for how to bring the troops home. McCain has said he wants to have an indefinite presence in Iraq (remember the 100 years comment) but has never said at what point he will bring the troops home. He has never defined what he means by "victory" and has never said how that would be achieved. All McCain has said that he would stay the course.

BUSINESSFORWARD

John—

As a business leader, your experiences are important to creating effective public policies that will grow our economy and create jobs. But how can you best communicate your views so that Washington listens?

Sharing your perspective with local and national media can be a particularly effective tool for encouraging policy action. And it can help bring attention to your business as a leader in your industry.

Please join Business Forward for an interactive media training. Using the effect of severe weather and climate change as a case study, seasoned public affairs strategists Aric Caplan and Jonathan Hahn will show you:

- How to present yourself as a thought leader and expert source;
- Tips for speaking about policy issues from your perspective as a business leader;
- Best practices for print and radio interviews.

Subsequent trainings in this series will focus on social media, television and public speaking appearances, and writing letters to the editor and op-eds.

Can you join our media training on print and radio interviews?

ABOUT THE TRAINERS

ARIC CAPLAN is the founder and president of Caplan Communications. For over 18 years, Mr. Caplan's winning issues advocacy campaigns have furthered the timely missions of civic organizations, non-profit groups and NGOs seeking to advance human rights, environmental protection and safeguard social justice. Caplan Communications also maintains a robust literary division that services the needs of major book publishers across the United States. As a seasoned public affairs strategist and avid news junkie, Mr. Caplan has made a career of renovating the air products of major-market news/talk radio stations in Pittsburgh and West Palm Beach, FL. He worked in radio as a reporter and producer at KDKA and program director at WJNO before entering public relations. In February 2004, Mr. Caplan founded his agency to champion issues in the public interest and on behalf of social justice and environmental causes. Aric Caplan frequently publishes editorials in industry trend magazines such as O'Dwyer's magazine and has been invited to address audiences on communications panels as a public affairs practitioner whose insights and approaches continue to reach and influence target audiences and Capitol Hill with precision.

JONATHAN HAHN is the managing director of Caplan Communications. He is a seasoned media trainer who specializes in strategic communication, public advocacy and story development. Mr. Hahn has managed press operations for various clean, renewable energy media relations events, including the Climate Action Campaign's 27-state "I will Act on Climate" bus tour. He also specializes in strategic advocacy and crisis public relations, which include the BP oil disaster in the Gulf of Mexico and Japan's Fukushima Daiichi nuclear disaster. He is a veteran media trainer with more than a decade of experience coaching executives to prepare for television, radio and print interviews.

Hillary Clinton to Jewish donors: I'll be better for Israel than Obama

But the former secretary of state is sending mixed signals on the president's Iran deal.

By Kenneth P. Vogel and Tarini Parti
7/3/15 6:33 AM EDT
Updated 7/3/15 6:33 AM EDT

Hillary Clinton is privately signaling to wealthy Jewish donors that — no matter the result of the Iranian nuclear negotiations — she will be a better friend to Israel than President Barack Obama.

But, even as donors increasingly push Clinton on the subject in private, they have emerged with sometimes widely varying interpretations about whether she would support a prospective deal, according to interviews with more than 10 influential donors and fundraising operatives.

Clinton's private responses in some ways resemble a foreign policy Rorschach test; donors who see a deal as important to world peace have come away thinking that Clinton shares their perspective, but so, too, do donors who oppose any prospective agreement as compromising Israeli security.

Publicly, she's expressed support for the negotiating process, which she secretly initiated during her time as secretary of state, but has also said "no deal is better than a bad deal."

With the talks heading into the home stretch in Vienna, the issue is emerging as an early test for Clinton's presidential campaign. She's already struggling to balance two of her biggest strengths as a candidate — her deep foreign policy track record and her vaunted fundraising ability — and that balance could become even trickier if there's a deal.

"Whatever way you go, there will be some people who won't like it," said Sarah

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kovner, a prominent New York donor who is a leading bundler for Clinton's campaign and worked in Bill Clinton's presidential administration. "You can't have everybody with you. You've got to do what you think is right for the country."

The negotiations are of intense interest for some Jewish donors whose political giving is animated by their support for Israel. They're being counted on by Clinton's allies to donate huge sums for a campaign and a pair of supportive super PACs that, taken together, are expected to raise $2 billion or more.

Clinton's campaign rejected any suggestion that she's trying to have it both ways on Iran.

"Her support for the negotiating process and touting support for Israel are not contradictory," said Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill. "A strong deal is good for Israel in her view."

And several people who've heard her address the issue say the fact that different people can come away with such different interpretations is a testament to her nuanced approach to the issue and her skill as a politician, rather than any vacillation on the subject.

"That's just smart politics," said one donor who supports the negotiations and recently talked to her about them. "Because, right now, you have the freedom to say all those things, so why would you commit and box yourself in until you saw what the deal was?"

Clinton recently told another pro-deal donor that she was "very supportive of the negotiating process," the donor recalled, while a third funder said she boasted of her role in starting the talks. "So it seemed like she was supporting it," recalled the funder.

And, at a Manhattan fundraiser last week featuring a largely Jewish group of donors, Clinton defended Obama against charges he had weakened the U.S.-Israel relationship, asserting that such criticism stemmed from a "perception" problem, according to a donor who was present. But she also suggested that if she were elected president she could correct that problem and bring the two nations closer.

"Diplomacy is all about personal relationships, and I've got my own relationships," she said, referencing her two-decade association with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, an ardent opponent of the Iran deal and, occasionally, of Obama. Clinton even cited her rapport with former Israeli ambassador to the U.S. Michael Oren, who last week published a book that was brutally critical of the Obama administration and was timed for release to try to stymie the Iran deal. "I know Michael well, but I haven't read the book," she said.

At a fundraiser last month at the Long Island home of Democratic donor Jay Jacobs, Clinton was asked by an Orthodox rabbi about threats to Israel's security. "She did stress in no uncertain terms her full and fervent support of the state of Israel and the defense of the state of Israel," recalled Jacobs. "And the people in the audience who heard it seemed to be comfortable with her answer."

Likewise, donors at a different New York fundraiser seemed to fully accept her answer to a slightly different question about the U.S. interest in the deal, said billionaire hedge fund manager Marc Lasry, a leading Clinton donor. "She said 'I'm going to do what's in the best interest of the U.S.,' and that was the end of it," Lasry said.

Dan Berger, a Philadelphia lawyer and major Democratic donor who supports the framework of a deal, cautioned that the interests of the U.S. and Israel, "although close, are not identical. It might not be in the best interest of American Jews, but it's got to be in the best interest of the majority of the people." He urged Jewish donors "to take a step back and look at the complexity and judge the agreement based on its merits," adding: "I'd hope Hillary would judge it based on its merits and not on political support."

Lasry rejected the suggestion that Clinton would even consider the fundraising implications when assessing any deal.

But Clinton's senior foreign policy advisers have briefed interested wealthy donors on both the negotiations over the deal and its prospects for congressional approval, according to one donor who recently talked to a top Clinton aide.

"It's a tricky issue for her," said the donor who was briefed, arguing that Jewish donors who oppose a deal and favor military intervention in Iran "are going to put her in a box."

Clinton's allies are carefully monitoring the sensitivities of a handful of hawkish Democratic mega-donors for signs that the Iran talks may be influencing their willingness to write million-dollar super PAC checks. Chief among that group is billionaire Hollywood entrepreneur Haim Saban, who sources say has spoken multiple times with Clinton and her top aides about the deal.

In April, he strongly suggested that Clinton opposed the deal. "I know where she stands, but I can't talk about it," Saban told an Israeli television news channel, adding under questioning, "She has an opinion, a very well-defined opinion. And in any case, everything that she thinks and everything she has done and will do will always be for the good of Israel. We don't need to worry about this."

He soon backtracked, saying "I have no idea what Hillary thinks about the Iran deal."

And multiple prominent Jewish donors who joined Saban at a White House meeting with Obama in April to discuss the Iran negotiations said Saban expressed open-mindedness about supporting the deal, though one participant suggested his opinion shouldn't hold as much weight as those of foreign policy professionals.

"Haim Saban is a very smart businessman who has a tremendous amount of love for the Clintons, but I don't think he is the most sophisticated policy analyst that there is," said the donor.

Saban's representatives did not respond to questions about his interactions with Clinton.

But on Thursday, POLITICO reported that he donated $2 million this year to a super PAC supporting her presidential campaign, which Democratic finance sources interpreted as a sign that Saban's financial support will not be conditioned on Clinton taking a certain stance on the Iran deal.

Steve Rabinowitz, a Democratic consultant who worked in the Clinton White House and was a co-founder of Jewish Americans Ready for Hillary, argued that the Iran deal isn't going to be a deciding issue for either donors or voters.

"Do people in my community talk about the Iran deal? Sure. But is it affecting their support for Hillary Clinton? No," he said. "Iran certainly will — and already has — become a talking point, but it will not move three votes or $3."

Clinton has the potential to bring along donors like Saban who might have been skeptical of negotiating with Iran, argued the Long Island donor Jacobs. "Hillary has a lot of credibility and support in the Jewish community. It's broad and deep. People understand that she has fought and has been there as an advocate," he said. "So when she speaks on the issue, there will be more people in the Jewish community who have perhaps unfairly not appreciated President Obama's support who will at least give her view a more open-minded assessment."

If Clinton backs any eventual deal, its proponents will be under pressure to step up their giving — both to the Clinton super PACs and to pro-deal groups — because she is likely to come under heavy fire from deep-pocketed groups that oppose the deal.

"If there's a deal, and she comes out in favor of it, you can be sure there will be a great deal of fire trained on her," said Noah Pollak, the executive director of the Emergency Committee for Israel. The conservative group has worked to rally opposition to the talks and this week began airing an ad pressuring New York Democratic Sen. Chuck Schumer, who is considered a key vote on the deal, to oppose it.

The left-leaning Israel advocacy group J Street, which has worked to build support for the deal, is expected to come to the defense of supporters, including potentially Clinton, though on some issues, the group's members regard her as too hawkish for their tastes.

"For people who speak on these Middle East issues on which we have strong positions, we come to their support and defense on those issues, regardless of party, regardless of candidacy," said Victor A Kovner, a Democratic donor who chairs J Street's PAC.

Kovner, like his wife, Sarah Kovner, is backing Clinton, and said he has communicated his support for a deal to the candidate.

"She is familiar with my view, but she has a lot of supporters and advisers on both sides of this question — around the nation, both within the Jewish community and beyond the Jewish community."

We've also found it successful when chatting with folks to frame energy/climate as integral to each of her four fights:

- investing in clean energy that will power the economy of the future

- protecting families from pollution

- safeguarding our country from the impacts of climate change and reducing our oil dependence

- preventing those who want to keep us trapped in the energy economy of the past from distorting our political process.

Hi John-

Here's the policy background Trevor Houser sent over for the Ben Gemen interview. Policy memo attached and at the bottom in plain text. All printed for you in the office as well in case you're able to make it in.

Thanks,
Milia

Note From Trevor Houser:

"Not sure if comms gave John background, but the reporter has been asking about HRC's process for a climate and enviro policy. Jake and the team felt now was an appropriate time to work with Ben Geman on that story in an effort to:

1) underscore how seriously she takes these issues;
2) Climate and Environment are top priorities for the campaign; and
3) The campaign is leading a deliberate and thoughtful policy process that has sought input from a large number of experts and key stakeholders in the environment, clean energy, and conservation communities.

The one other thing I would flag for John is that if Ben asks whether we would support a permanent extension of the PTC/ITC we need to hedge given out solar/renewable targets. Those imply a $10-$15 billion per year price tag by 2020 and $25-$35 billion per year by 2027 if extended at current levels. May need to call for "extending and improving" or something like that."

Secretary of State Record

As Secretary, Hillary fought hard to mobilize a global response to climate change. She immediately created the first high-level post at the State Department dedicated exclusively to climate diplomacy (the US Special Envoy for Climate Change)

She put climate squarely on the agenda during her first trip as Secretary to Beijing

Hillary worked to feature climate change in the annual US-China Strategic and Economic Dialogue meeting

She helped to hammer out the breakthrough that led to the Copenhagen Accord, which, among other things, was the first international agreement in which all of the major economies – including China – committed to reduce their greenhouse gas pollution.

In addition, she worked hard as Secretary to build new coalitions to combat emissions from methane and other super-pollutants that damage the climate, as well as to launch a clean cookstove initiative that is bringing not only health but climate benefits.

In pursuing these international agreements, and the leadership we are showing at home and abroad, the United States now has a much stronger hand to play in the upcoming negotiations in Paris.

Re: Energy, Climate and Environment Policy Platform

This memo provides a brief overview of our proposed energy, climate and environment policy platform. We have developed six major policy initiatives that together offer a comprehensive strategy for a) protecting American families from pollution, b) powering the economy of the future, c) delivering energy and climate security that lasts, and d) responsibly stewarding our country's natural bounty and beauty. We are finalizing separate white papers with more detail on each of the six initiatives.

Our platform is designed to make the US the clean energy superpower of the 21st century and a global leader in the fight against climate change, and to do so in a way that provides economic opportunity and security for all Americans. We will have half a billion solar panels installed across the country by 2020 and generate enough renewable energy to power every home in the country within 10 years. During that time we will reduce US oil consumption by 20% and partner with other countries bring global oil demand growth to a halt [note: this is a proposed target we haven't yet discussed as a group].

The next decade is critical if we are going to successfully transition to a clean energy economy, deliver security that lasts, and prevent catastrophic climate change. The following is an ambitious and achievable plan of attack.

1. Smart Standards

We will fight efforts to roll back environmental protections in favor of polluters. We will defend and extend common-sense standards that make our air and water cleaner, safeguard the health of our families, reduce energy waste, driven clean energy deployment and fight global climate change. This includes full implementation of the Clean Power Plan, extension of efficiency standards for cars, trucks, airplanes and appliances, better building codes, mandatory disclosure of fracking chemicals and methane regulations on oil and gas production.

2. Clean Energy Challenge

Standards set the floor, not the ceiling. We can and must go further. We will form a new partnership with states, cities and rural communities that are ready to lead, providing competitive grants to those that exceed federal guidelines, remove barriers to clean energy access and entrepreneurship, and invest in innovative solutions that reduce energy costs, protect public health and cut carbon pollution.

As part of this bargain, we will guarantee that every agency within the federal government is working in concert to ensure Americans have the tools and resources they need to succeed. That includes investing in new technologies, both in our labs and through our tax code, and ensuring that we are maximizing the clean energy potential of public lands and public buildings. We will expand successful innovation initiatives, like ARPA-e, cut those that fail to deliver results, and ensure that public R&D supports private sector entrepreneurialism, small business creation and employment growth.

3. Modernizing North American Infrastructure

We must improve the safety and security of existing energy infrastructure in North America and ensure that the new infrastructure we build is consistent with the clean energy economy we are seeking to create. We will launch a major initiative to repair, replace and better regulate our existing pipeline and rail network to protect our families, communities, and outdoor economy from the risk of oil spills and explosions and protect the climate from fugitive methane emissions. And we'll negotiate a North American Climate Compact with Canada and Mexico that guides future infrastructure investment on the continent through ambitious emission reduction commitments, coordinated policy action, and strong accountability mechanisms.

Security that Lasts

The recent growth in domestic oil and gas production provides important economic and geopolitical benefits, but it doesn't solve the energy-related security issues that have plagued our country for decades. US gasoline prices will continue to be set by the global market, no matter how much oil we produce, leaving our economy vulnerable to supply disruptions elsewhere in the world. In addition, the more oil and other fossil fuels we burn, the more risk we bear – both to our economy and our national security - from higher sea levels and increasingly devastating storms, heatwaves and droughts.

The only way to truly safeguard our country is to reduce the amount of oil consumed both at home and around the world and make our investments, our communities and our infrastructure more resilient to climate-related risks. We will take actions necessary to drive down oil consumption in the US, and will partner with other countries to halt the growth in global oil consumption within the next ten years. We will lead the world in combatting climate change, build resilient infrastructure and ensure American families, businesses and investors have actionable information on the kinds of risks they face.

Collaborative Stewardship

We are still developing the public lands/conservation leg of the platform, which will include the following components:

1. Royalty reform: Raise the on-shore oil and gas royalty rate on public lands to match that charged on private lands in Texas and other states and close the loophole in coal royalty policy that costs taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars per year.

2. Leasing: Take areas too sensitive for energy production, like the Arctic, off the table.

3. LWCF: Fully fund the Land and Water Conservation Fund

4. Outdoor economy: Support the growth of the outdoor economy by protecting national parks and forests and improving access to public lands for hunters and anglers and other types of recreation.

A Just Transition

As we build the energy economy of the 21st century, we cannot turn our backs on the workers and communities in the coalfields who kept the lights on and factories running during the 20th century. We will ensure that the retirement benefits of coal miners and their families are secure, invest in carbon capture, utilization and sequestration technology, and launch a major workforce and local economic development initiative for coalfield communities from Central Appalachia to the Powder River Basin.

We will also address the legacy costs fossil fuel combustion in communities disproportionately impacted by the resulting air pollution. We will provide block grants to states, cities and rural communities that develop innovative economic development and public health solutions for vulnerable communities as part of their clean energy strategy, such as the SB 535 program in California.

William Rivers Pitt | Meet the New War, Same as the Old War

William Rivers Pitt, Truthout: Maybe President Obama's words last night will prove prescient and the latest US action in Iraq and Syria will work out fine. Maybe airstrikes alone will work for the first time in recorded history to defeat a foe. Except every time we drop bombs on a problem that was caused by us dropping bombs, we wind up dropping more bombs to try and solve it.

MAJOR DOMESTIC INITIATIVES

Alliance for a Healthier Generation (AHG)

- The Alliance received a $1.5 million grant from the Walmart Foundation to expand its Healthy Out of School Time Initiative to four additional markets: Little Rock, Miami, Oklahoma City and Philadelphia.
- The Alliance and the Michael & Susan Dell Foundation released the second edition of the Be Well! series--A year of Living Well--that includes stories from Moms, Dads and Youth who have made a healthy living impact on their families and communities. These books are available at no cost in English and Spanish. More than 1.2 million copies of the first edition were distributed.
- The Alliance launched a “water is best” campaign with Brita.

Clinton Health Matters Initiative (CHMI)

- Tenet Healthcare Corporation has signed on as the title sponsor (at $450,000) for the Health Matters conference for the second year in a row. To date, other conference sponsors include Verizon, GE, Masimo, Sanofi, and Lionel Rabb.
- The CHMI website, developed in partnership with NBC Universal, will launch this Monday, November 12.
- At the invitation of Judge Buddy Villines, Ginny Ehrlich presented the plan to activate the CHMI community strategy in Pulaski County to all county mayors. Work will begin in early December.

MAJOR INTERNATIONAL INITIATIVES

Clinton Development Initiative (CDI)
Malawi

- Preparations are continuing on five commercial farms for planting. Growing contracts with SeedCo, Pannar, Senwes, Carlsberg Breweries and Funwe Seed Company are being finalized.
- First payments to smallholder tree farmers from recent carbon credit sales will be made in the next several weeks.

Rwanda (CHDI)

- The soybean factory project is moving according to CHDI's timeframe. The company's board is currently working to secure a bank loan for the factory, as the equity money has run out. CHDI is in negotiations with three banks and is in need of a total of $7 million--$2 million for capital expenditures and $5 million for working capital.
- With regards to the AGRA project, CHDI has concluded seed distribution within the three districts of the project area for the coming season, and has concluded its trial set up for the season. The Government is providing strong support by pushing soybean planting in other districts in Eastern Province in order to prepare raw material availability for the edible oil plant.

Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative (CGSGI)
Peru

- The CGSGI cataracts project has just reached 45,000 surgeries, now at 90% of its committed 50,000 target. The 50,000th surgery is expected to be recorded in the first quarter of the new year.

MSNBC: "Benghazi coming back with a vengeance in September"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

September 1, 2014, 7:12 a.m. EDT

After several mercifully Benghazi-free months, the 2012 attack on the diplomatic compound in Libya is about to be thrust back into the spotlight around its September 11 anniversary.

The special House committee investigating Benghazi is finally expected to begin its work, in earnest, with its first hearing the week Congress returns from August recess. Meanwhile, two books promising explosive new allegations about the terror attack will hit shelves in September, and Fox News plans to air a new, one-hour documentary on the attack this week, featuring exclusive interviews with Americans who fought in the onslaught.

Add that to the usual fare that accompanies the anniversary of any major news event and you get a headache for the teams surrounding Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama. For both, it's a stubborn political problem that will likely never go away, no matter how many investigations clear the senior players of the worst allegations of wrongdoing. And it's little doubt why: Polls suggest that Clinton is vulnerable on Benghazi ahead of a potential 2016 presidential run, with members of both parties listing it as her biggest weakness.

Partisans on both sides are gearing up for the return of Benghazi. Tim MIller, for example, who is the executive director of the GOP super PAC America Rising, told msnbc his team is prepared to jump on "anything that comes up in these books/hearings that call into question Sec. Clinton's claims." And Clinton defenders at Democratic groups like Correct the Record and American Bridge say they will be ready to respond to any incoming fire, and are already passing along research to undermine the books.

On Sept. 9, conservative talk radio host Aaron Klein's "The Real Benghazi Story" will hit bookstores. Published by an imprint of World Net Daily (the website that promotes the notion that Obama was not born in the U.S.), the book promises "to blow the lid off" "shocking," "devastating," and "mind-blowing" new details of the terror attack. It's the story "the White House and Hillary don't want you to know," the book's subtitle claims.

Klein's audience is undoubtedly the already-converted, but three of his previous books have made it to The New York Times bestseller list, and his latest is easy fodder for the conservative echo chamber. Klein has plans to promote the book in New York and Washington, and already "has interview commitments with top-tier cable, radio and print outlets," according to his publicist.

Then, at the end of the month comes "13 Hours: The Inside Account of What Really Happened In Benghazi." The book is likely to gain more traction in the mainstream press, considering its author, Boston University journalism professor Mitchell Zuckoff, and publisher, Hachette, a well respected house.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Zuckoff got unprecedented access to the six Americans who defended the CIA annex in Benghazi and tells their story from the ground. Paramount reportedly bought the film rights months ago and has a screenwriter and producers attached to the project.

Zuckoff's book promises to "set the record straight" on what happened on the ground, but will not dwell much on the politics or bureaucratic wrangling in Washington. Still, even if Clinton barely makes a cameo, anytime people are talking about Benghazi its bad for Clinton. The book may also provide embarrassing new details from people closest to the attack.

Zuckoff's work also spawned an hour-long Fox News special, set to air Friday, in which host Bret Baier interviews the security operators. The documentary is being promoted by Fox and will likely further stir the pot on the right.

The House Select Committee on Benghazi – the seventh congressional committee that has looked into the attacks – has been quiet since its inception this spring, will hold its first hearing the second week of September. Led by South Carolina Republican Rep. Trey Gowdy, Republicans last week hired the Army's former top lawyer to be their general counsel. They're finishing staffing up, but are revealing little about future plans beyond the first hearing. The Democratic side, led by Maryland Rep. Elijah Cummings, say they are mostly staffed up.

Rep. Adam Schiff, a California Democrat who sits on the select committee, said that while Gowdy has been inclusive of Democrats and responsible thus far, he'll have to deal with high expectations from the conservative base. "I'm not sure where we're headed. I'm not sure the House leadership knows where we're headed. But I do think there's going to be a lot pressure on the chairman to produce something," he told msnbc.

Gowdy told The New York Times Friday that it will likely take until at least the end of 2015 for the committee to complete its work, but that it could go into 2016 if agencies are slow to turn over requested documents.

Some Democrats and Clinton allies, who have long dismissed the slew of Benghazi investigations as being politically motivated, say they expect the committee will be used to attack Obama in anticipation of the midterm elections, before turning attention to Clinton afterwards. But Schiff said the committee is unlikely to produce anything in time for 2014 elections. He did, however, say there will be tremendous pressure on Gowdy to bring Clinton as a witness.

Other Democrats are treating a Clinton testimony request as a certainty.

"I don't think there are many new facts to be found there," Schiff added.

Washington Post: "Clintons keep up with a sprawling, yet aging, political network in Arkansas"

By Philip Rucker

August 31, 2014, 10:31 p.m. EDT

LITTLE ROCK — While Bill and Hillary Clinton were vacationing in August at their rented mansion on a scenic bluff in the tony Hamptons, they read a flurry of e-mail updates from an earlier life.

At 7:41 one Monday morning, the Clintons received word that the elderly mother of longtime Little Rock radio and television personality Craig O'Neill had passed away.

A few days later, another bulletin: Rufus Ellis "Buddy" Tate Jr., a farmer and lumberer from Marvell, Ark., died five days shy of his 100th birthday. His only child, Sherman Tate, is an old friend of Bill's.

Then another: Dorothy Jean Darr Martinous, who managed the bridal salon at J.C. Penney and was a prize-winning dancer of the Charleston, died at age 98. She had been active for decades in Arkansas Democratic politics.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In each case, the notices came from a 70-year-old retiree named Lynda Dixon, who worked as Bill Clinton's personal secretary when he was governor of Arkansas and now fires off e-mails to her old boss, Hillary Rodham Clinton and their aides from her home here in downtown Little Rock, within view of the Clinton Presidential Center.

"Lynda's List," as her under-the-radar alumni news service is called, is a telling example of the Clintons' attention to detail in maintaining and nurturing their formidable political network, which extends around the globe yet remains perhaps deepest in Arkansas. The couple's strong ties to the state have been highlighted this year as Bill spends time here stumping on behalf of Democratic candidates in the November midterms.

After the Clintons packed up from Arkansas in 1993 to move to the White House, never to return permanently, Dixon stayed behind and kept the couple up to date with news from their sprawling — and aging — network of friends and acquaintances. Once full of wedding and baby announcements, or reports of a new job or award, Dixon's notices nowadays more commonly deliver word of who is sick, who has died and who needs a helping hand.

"I am the one that knows who his friends were, all his constituents that were important to him — I just send notices to him and Hillary," Dixon said in a rare interview. Unlike many Clinton hands who lead public careers, Dixon has served the couple in near-anonymity.

In anticipation of Hillary Clinton's potential 2016 presidential campaign, the Clintons are keeping their Arkansas network especially active. Their allies here insist she would put Arkansas in play, even though the state has become more Republican since Bill Clinton carried it in the 1990s. President Obama lost here by 20 percentage points in 2008 and by 24 percentage points in 2012.

The Clintons have staffs in New York and Washington, but, Dixon said, those aides "don't know the Devoe Bollingers of the world. He was one of the president's constituents, one of his supporters, an old cattle farmer from Horatio, Arkansas."

Dixon said she scours the obituary pages of local newspapers and calls funeral homes looking for familiar names. At the top of each e-mail to the Clintons, Dixon writes the name, address and phone number of the subject — or, in the case of death, a next-of-kin. Like clockwork, that person often gets a call from Bill. A few days later, a warm letter from Hillary might show up in the mail. And in some instances, the Clintons fly home to attend funerals, as Bill did on Aug. 15 in Hot Springs, where he bade farewell to Margaret "Marge" Mitchell, a close friend of his late mother. The former president was an honorary pallbearer.

"You may move from your home town, you may move from your home state, but you don't forget from where you came, and Bill Clinton is the prime example of that," said Skip Rutherford, a longtime Clinton adviser and friend who serves as dean of the University of Arkansas's Clinton School of Public Service.

When Bill returned to Little Rock on Aug. 15 to address a meeting of the Southern Governors' Association, he referred to Arkansas as "our state."

"I'm feeling pretty nostalgic," he said, noting that he woke up in New York that morning at 4:45 to fly to Hot Springs for Mitchell's funeral.

At a time when the Clintons are under scrutiny for their family's exploding wealth and extravagant lifestyle on the paid speaking circuit, reminding voters of Hillary's Arkansas roots has political benefits. This is where she married Bill, raised daughter Chelsea, practiced law, came of age politically, and, as first lady, championed state education and children's health initiatives.

In July 2013, both Clintons attended the dedication of the Hillary Rodham Clinton Children's Library in Little Rock, a gleaming facility where, as Bill marveled in his recent speech to the governors, "they've got a 3-D printer!" At the opening, Hillary read "The Very Hungry Caterpillar" to youngsters sitting around her feet.

Hillary returned this May for the opening of the Clinton Presidential Center's temporary blown-glass exhibit by artist Dale Chihuly. And she came in June to sign copies of her latest book, "Hard Choices," at a suburban Wal-Mart.

But in this high-stakes election year, it's Bill who's been an especially frequent visitor, throwing himself into Arkansas races. With his sky-high popularity — his favorability rating was 68 percent among registered voters in Arkansas in a May NBC News-Marist poll — he is trying to boost three longtime friends: Sen. Mark Pryor, gubernatorial candidate Mike Ross and congressional candidate James Lee Witt.

In August, Clinton headlined a Democratic Party fundraiser at Little Rock's historic Capital Hotel, and associates said he is coming back in September and October to campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“If he could get away with it, he’d live here for the two to three weeks before the election,” said Vince Insalaco, the state Democratic Party’s chairman and a longtime Clinton friend.

Arkansas Gov. Mike Beebe (D) said that when he asked Clinton’s staff if he would come to the August events, “they weren’t real high on him coming” because the Clintons were vacationing in the Hamptons. But once Beebe got the former president on the phone to personally invite him, it was easy to get to “yes.”

“A vacation from vacation is probably consistent with his personality,” Beebe said. Here in Arkansas, he added, “he soaks up information like a sponge. He’s always wanting to know the politics, he’s always wanting to know the policy, and even more often than when he comes, I’m getting a phone call from him.”

Before the Little Rock fundraiser, Clinton huddled with Pryor to talk politics. Pryor said he met Clinton when he was about 12; his father, David Pryor, served as governor when Clinton was climbing the political ladder as attorney general, and then as a U.S. senator when Clinton was governor and president.

“It’s not unusual if you’re in Arkansas for the phone to ring at an odd hour and it be Bill Clinton at the end of the line,” Mark Pryor said as he rested his hands on his Bible during an interview on a recent Sundaymorning before church.

Clinton is eyeing the race to succeed Beebe with special interest. The Democratic nominee is Ross, a protege who got his start in politics as Clinton’s 21-year-old driver during the 1982 governor’s campaign.

“We had a one-car motorcade: It was him and me in a Chevy Citation,” Ross recalled. “People wanted their photo taken with him. I’d take it with one of those old Polaroid cameras where the picture shoots out the front. He would autograph the bottom and say, ‘You’ll have your picture developed in a couple minutes.’ ”

Clinton helped persuade Ross — a former congressman who graduated from Hope High School, in Clinton’s birthplace — to run for governor and has counseled him throughout the race.

The Republican nominee is Asa Hutchinson, who as a congressman in the late 1990s was a floor manager of Clinton’s impeachment proceedings following the Monica Lewinsky scandal. For many Clinton loyalists here, Hutchinson’s role still stings.

“It’s kind of like being against the Razorbacks,” Insalaco said, referring to the University of Arkansas sports teams. “It wasn’t just being against Clinton, but against the whole state. . . . Insiders remember, but voters outside, I think they may need to be reminded.”

Hutchinson said Democrats were “grasping at straws.” And he argued that Bill Clinton’s popularity would not rub off on Ross. “Arkansas is not really a coattails state,” he said.

Bill Clinton, busy reconnecting with old friends here, is trying to challenge that prophecy.

After Clinton’s August fundraiser at the Capital Hotel, George Hale, 69, settled into a couch in the lobby. When a reporter introduced himself, Hale said, “I’m an F.O.B. Friend of Bill.”

This May, after Hale’s wife died, Hale said Clinton “sent me a little handwritten note saying he was very sorry for the loss. He said, ‘Hang in there, George.’ ”

How did Clinton know about Hale’s loss? Lynda’s List, of course.

Jewish Journal opinion: Lazar Palnick: “Hillary, Israel and the Jews”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Lazar Palnick

August 29, 2014

Last month, I read an opinion piece in a Jewish publication wrongfully accusing Hillary Clinton of being anti-Israel and not fighting for the issues that matter most to Jewish Americans. This couldn't be further from the truth. Throughout her career, Hillary Clinton has fought for and been a strong ally and representative of the Jewish community. To suggest otherwise is just absurd.

I have been lucky enough to know Hillary Clinton for more than 35 years, ever since I was a teenager in Arkansas in the 1970s. I don't know anyone who is more able and ready to work on the issues that matter and to make sure that the ideas and concerns of the Jewish people are addressed.

I first met Hillary when my father, who was a Rabbi in Little Rock, went to Fayetteville to perform the town's first ever Bar Mitzvah. At the reception, we met a nice young couple, Bill and Hillary Clinton. My parents and the Clintons became friends, and thus began a long history working together in public service.

The author of the piece I read cites obscure references to Hillary Clinton's life and work back in Arkansas. Having witnessed that time in her life, I can say how misleading and unrepresentative these are to her history fighting for and understanding important issues to the Jewish community.

Hillary was always close to the Jewish community, and she and I worked together on many projects. Behind the scenes, Hillary became one of the leaders of a group of civic-minded professionals who worked together to help people of all faiths strive for communication and cooperation. While Hillary was a Methodist and Bill a Baptist, they always supported interfaith activities.

Hillary was always good at thinking outside the box and finding unique solutions to problems. While traveling, Hillary discovered an Israeli educational program that was designed to help immigrants and their children adjust to life in new countries. Hillary studied the groundbreaking program and figured out that it could be adapted to help economically disadvantaged families in Arkansas. Hillary brought the HIPPY program to Arkansas, where it was soon offered statewide and now operates in 21 states, serving 15,000 families.

I also noticed that the author conveniently chose to exempt from his argument Hillary Clinton's eight years in the Senate where, as a Senator from New York, she came to know the largest Jewish constituency outside of Israel and was an outspoken defender of Israel. Hillary Clinton's support within the Jewish communities of both New York and Arkansas is a testament to her friendships and relationships that have been developed over a lifetime.

Conflicts in Israel and the Middle East weigh heavy in the hearts and minds of the Jewish community. Strong leadership from leaders who understand our history and share the interests of the Jewish people is needed to bring about peaceful resolutions. The article chooses to neglect this in passing judgment on Hillary Clinton's record as Secretary of State.

As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton continued her strong support for Israel. One of her greatest achievements as Secretary of State was negotiating a cease-fire to avert an all-out war in Gaza. She also helped lead efforts to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons. On the U.S's relationship with Israel, Hillary said, "Israel and the United States are united by a deep and unbreakable bond based on mutual interests and respect."

The domestic issues that the Jewish community cares about - freedom of religion and separation of church and state, personal freedoms and rights, education, and health care - are issues Hillary Clinton has worked on her entire life. Her passionate support of the Jewish community culminated with her being awarded a lifetime achievement award from the American Jewish Congress.

From her foreign policy abroad to her work back home, Hillary Clinton has consistently shown her support and dedication to the issues that matter most to Jewish Americans.

I share in the thoughts of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in saying to Hillary Clinton, "you are a great friend and a great champion of peace," and I hope the rest of the Jewish community can share in this long-lasting bond with Hillary Clinton.

Washington Times: "O'Hillary: The Ready for Hillary superpac journeys to Ireland, raises $50,000"

By Jennifer Harper

September 1, 2014

Fundraise for Hillary Clinton in Ireland: faith and begorra, that's exactly what Ready for Hillary did. The independent grass-roots activist group traveled all the way to Ballsbridge - that's an exclusive suburb of Dublin - to raise $50,000 for Mrs. Clinton, a potential White House candidate.

A hundred fans showed up on Friday night for the event, organized by New York-based attorney Brian O'Dwyer and hosted by local power couple Linda and Brian Farren, who also have raised money for former President Bill Clinton in the past.

The Irish press was intrigued, boasting headlines like "Is Ireland ready for Hillary?" and suggesting that the nation feels ignored by the Obama administration. Meanwhile, only American citizens could donate to the cause, though organizers suggested Irish folks would donate if they could. Mrs. Clinton herself was not at the event. Iowa, rather than Ireland, is calling.

She will attend retiring Sen. Tom Harkin's 37th annual steak fry on Sept. 14 in the company of Mr. Clinton - which might be problematic, as he is a vegan. But no matter. He can have a veggie fry. Ready for Hillary will also be there, incidentally. The group is raffling off an all-expenses-paid trip to the event for an eager Clinton fan.

Washington Examiner: "Six signs Hillary Clinton is running"

By Rebecca Berg

September 1, 2014, 5:00 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton isn't officially running for president. But unofficially, the signs are everywhere.

Most Democrats expect the former secretary of state won't make a public decision before the midterm elections in November. But her actions so far this year have pretty much confirmed what most people already thought.

Here are six steps she's taken toward a presidential campaign:

The memoir.

A carefully crafted, inoffensive memoir is nearly a prerequisite to the modern presidential campaign, a convenient way for a candidate to tell her story on her own terms. Clinton released her memoir "Hard Choices" this summer, detailing her tenure as secretary of State, and outlining her policy perspectives on a wide range of foreign policy and national security issues. The book tour was not unlike a presidential campaign: Clinton crisscrossed the nation for book signings, speeches, and interviews, receiving outsized media attention all the while.

The super PACs.

Without money, there is no presidential bid — and Clinton will be able to count on plenty of the former. Two super PACs, although by law directly unaffiliated with Clinton herself, have already set to work raising money and building lists of volunteers to help Clinton hit the ground running if she decides to seek the presidency. The first, Priorities USA, which supported President Obama in 2008, has aligned itself early with Clinton and has brought on former Obama campaign manager Jim Messina to help attract the party's biggest donors. The second group, Ready For Hillary, has been methodically building a nationwide network of Clinton supporters and collecting mostly small-dollar donations.

The office upgrade.

Clinton recently relocated her personal office to a larger space in midtown Manhattan, an important step should she want to add to her existing staff in advance of a presidential bid. The office likely would not house her presidential campaign headquarters, but serve as a transitional space.

The trip to Iowa.

In 2008, Clinton posted a disappointing result in the key Iowa caucuses, where she finished third behind Obama and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards. This time, she's launching her Iowa charm offensive early, with a trip to the Hawkeye State in September. Clinton will headline the annual Steak Fry of Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, an important political event, along with her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

The cautious remarks.

Clinton drew some criticism for taking more than a week to respond to the protests in Ferguson, Mo., but her caution was hardly surprising. Clinton appears to have made a deliberate calculation that any newsmaking statements that could later pop up in a campaign setting where views have changed. That's not to say Clinton hasn't taken some risks, however. In an interview with The Atlantic, Clinton attempted to distance herself from some of the president's foreign policy by calling his decision not to intervene early in Syria a "failure."

The celebrity endorsements.

Should she run for president, Clinton will likely have no trouble lining up celebrity surrogates on her behalf. In fact, they're lining up already. Singer Katy Perry snapped a photo with Clinton earlier this year, with the caption: "I told @hillaryclinton that I would write her a 'theme' song if she needs it..." Actresses Liv Tyler and Aubrey Plaza, among others, have also expressed their early support for Clinton.

Wonkette (satire): "At The New York Times, A Slow News Day"

By Doktor Zoom

August 31, 2014, 3:38 p.m. EDT

Things have quieted down in Ferguson and we have a holiday weekend, so the New York Times is full of analysis-type stuff today. There's a pretty good piece on Democrats' attempts to mobilize African-American voters who are outraged over Michael Brown's shooting (and another story about that effort in Ferguson, specifically). There's also longish story about the Chinese Communist Party's attempt to prevent Hong Kong from doing free-n-fair elections, which is both well-reported and interesting, but which we bet you won't read because it is not sexxay, you laggards. Go on, we dare you! You probably can't handle it! The big breaking news of the morning, we guess, is the St. Louis Rams' cutting Michael Sam, and if you read the New York Times for sports news, that's in there too.

How about more analysis stuff? ISIS is both medieval in its politics, and pretty darn modern in its use of social media, doing what the Times calls "jihad 3.0." Also, too, five years after everyone freaked out about "Death Panels" in Obamacare, insurance companies are increasingly covering end of life planning sessions, and the American Medical Association has recently requested that Medicare do the same. The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services is considering the proposal but not saying anything about how it may decide, so get ready for a Return of the Death Panels — or not, maybe, since aging Boomers really want coverage for their visits to plan living wills and such. And here's some cheery news: "Temporary" jobs are becoming a bigger part of the employment picture, and we're all doomed (OK, we skimmed that one).

The Social Q's advice column is as terrible as it ever was, and fun to read because you can thank your personal deities (ours are Molly Ivins and George Carlin) that you don't know any people like these:

An old friend has a perennial problem being faithful to girlfriends. His current mate, whom he met while cheating on his former girlfriend, recently discovered a number of his dalliances. She decided to stay with him, but asked me to stop being friends with one of the women he cheated with. (I was not aware of the affair while it was going on, if that matters.) Trouble is, I am not that close with the girlfriend, but I've become quite friendly with the woman I've been asked to drop. Thoughts?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We can't really quibble with the advice — "Simply ignore the request. You are not that close" — and the suggestion that if the new GF continues to press the issue, it would be best to sympathize but add "You focus on your relationships, and I'll tend to mine." But yeesh, we're happy we don't have any friends who are apparently still in junior high school. Also, too, there is a question about diarrhea, right there in the Paper of Record:

A sweet friend, who is justifiably modest about her culinary abilities, had us to dinner at her house. The next day, when I called to thank her, she said her husband had been up all night, feeling queasy. I did not confess that I, too, had suffered symptoms associated with travel in third-world countries because my friend (who has a low self-esteem thanks to a rough childhood) would be crushed. My husband viewed this as a matter of public health and thought I should have spoken up to prevent future episodes. What say you?

Irene, Stamford, Conn.

Again, the advice is spot-on (ewww), and even gets to the central weirdness of the question:

When your friend opens a food truck, trolling the streets of Stamford to hawk her extra-rare chicken cordon bleu, that is the moment for speaking up. But the morning after a modest dinner for four, where 25 percent of the guests have already complained of food-related illness, I would probably keep it to myself [...] But you have conjured a heroine almost as fragile as Laura Wingfield in "The Glass Menagerie." Why smash her unicorn (again)?

Honestly, only here on Wonkette would we ever say, "Oh, yeah, that gave me the squirts, too!"

Which seems like the obvious transition to the Sunday Review section, and the note that Ross Douthat and Tom Friedman are off today, does it not? Instead, Roger Cohen has a column about Barack Obama's "hesitant foreign policy," and why mister we could use a man like Richard Holbrooke again.

Frank Bruni has a book-blurb as a column, about Sam Harris's upcoming Waking Up, which asks what it means to be "spiritual but not religious." It's every bit as fascinating and exciting as a Frank Bruni column should be, although Bruni does have this worthwhile question:

We hear the highest-ranking politicians mention God at every turn and with little or no fear of negative repercussion. When's the last time you heard one of them wrestle publicly with agnosticism?

Hahaha, this is a hilarious question, seeing as how it is written about elected politicians in the United States of America Under God.

Maureen Dowd manages a third straight week without any mention of Bill or Hillary Clinton, largely because she's hanging out with a celebrity, Matthew Michael Sheen [one of those "M" names, whatevs -- Dok Z], star of Masters of Sex. Skip it, unless you like Matthew Michael Sheen a whole lot.

Nicholas Kristoff has the groundbreaking insight that white people, very often, simply Don't Get It, and he is eager to "push back at what I see as smug white delusion," which will probably win him some friends among the Bill O'Reillys of the world. After a litany of statistics that should be shocking, he says,

All these constitute not a black problem or a white problem, but an American problem. When so much talent is underemployed and overincarcerated, the entire country suffers.

Kristoff hopes that if more whites actually had black friends, they might become a little more aware of what reality is like for black Americans:

I was shaken after a well-known black woman told me about looking out her front window and seeing that police officers had her teenage son down on the ground after he had stepped out of their upscale house because they thought he was a prowler. "Thank God he didn't run," she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One black friend tells me that he freaked out when his white fiancée purchased an item in a store and promptly threw the receipt away. “What are you doing?” he protested to her. He is a highly successful and well-educated professional but would never dream of tossing a receipt for fear of being accused of shoplifting.

And he also says that a “starting point is for those of us in white America to wipe away any self-satisfaction about racial progress.” Yes, we got rid of Jim Crow, in a legal sense, but maybe it also would be helpful “to acknowledge that the central race challenge in America today is not the suffering of whites.”

It will be fascinating to see how Fox News addresses Nicholas Kristoff’s shockingly racist anti-white column.

Book Questions Clinton Donations

By AMY CHOZICK APRIL 19, 2015

http://www.nytimes.com/2015/04/20/us/politics/book-questions-clinton-donations.html?_r=0

The book does not hit shelves until May 5, but already the Republican Rand Paul has called its findings "big news" that will "shock people" and make voters "question" the candidacy of Hillary Rodham Clinton .

"Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich," by Peter Schweizer — a 186-page investigation of donations made to the Clinton Foundation by foreign entities — is proving the most anticipated and feared book of a presidential cycle still in its infancy.

The book, a copy of which was obtained by The New York Times, asserts that foreign entities who made payments to the Clinton Foundation and to Mr. Clinton through high speaking fees received favors from Mrs. Clinton's State Department in return.

"We will see a pattern of financial transactions involving the Clintons that occurred contemporaneous with favorable U.S. policy decisions benefiting those providing the funds,"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Schweizer writes.

His examples include a free-trade agreement in Colombia that benefited a major foundation donor's natural resource investments in the South American nation, development projects in the aftermath of the Haitian earthquake in 2010, and more than $1 million in payments to Mr. Clinton by a Canadian bank and major shareholder in the Keystone XL oil pipeline around the time the project was being debated in the State Department.

In the long lead up to Mrs. Clinton's campaign announcement, aides proved adept in swatting down critical books as conservative propaganda, including Edward Klein's "Blood Feud," about tensions between the Clintons and the Obamas, and Daniel Halper's "Clinton Inc.: The Audacious Rebuilding of a Political Machine."

But "Clinton Cash" is potentially more unsettling, both because of its focused reporting and because major news organizations are expected to pursue the story lines found in the book.

Members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee have been briefed about the book's findings, which have already made their way into several of the Republican presidential candidates' campaigns.

Conservative "super PACs" plan to seize on "Clinton Cash," and a pro-Democrat super PAC has already assembled a dossier on Mr. Schweizer, a speechwriting consultant to former President George W. Bush and a fellow at the conservative Hoover Institute, to make the case that he has a bias against Mrs. Clinton.

And the newly assembled Clinton campaign team is planning a full-court press to diminish the book as yet another conservative hit job.

Mr. Schweizer and a spokeswoman for HarperCollins, which is owned by News Corporation and is publishing the book, declined to comment.

The timing is problematic for Mrs. Clinton as she begins a campaign to position herself as a "champion for everyday Americans."

From 2001 to 2012, the Clintons' income was at least $136.5 million, Mr. Schweizer writes, using a figure previously reported in The Washington Post. "During Hillary's years of public service, the Clintons have conducted or facilitated hundreds of large transactions" with foreign governments, he writes. "Some of these transactions have put millions in their own pockets."

Continue reading the main story

The Clinton Foundation has come under scrutiny for accepting foreign donations while Mrs. Clinton served as secretary of state. Last week, the foundation revised its policy to allow donations from countries like Germany, Canada, the Netherlands and Britain but prohibit giving by other nations in the Middle East.

Mr. Schweizer's book will be released the same day former President Bill Clinton and the Clintons' daughter, Chelsea, will host the Clinton Global Initiative gathering with donors in Morocco, the culmination of a foundation trip to several African nations. (A chapter in the book is titled “Warlord Economics: The Clintons do Africa.”)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There is a robust market for books critical of the Clintons. The thinly sourced “Blood Feud,” by Mr. Klein, at one point overtook Mrs. Clinton’s memoir “Hard Choices” on the best-seller list.

But whether Mr. Schweizer’s book can deliver the same sales is not clear.

Mr. Schweizer writes mainly in the voice of a neutral journalist and meticulously documents his sources, including tax records and government documents, while leaving little doubt about his view of the Clintons.

His reporting largely focuses on payments made to Mr. Clinton for speeches, which increased while his wife served as secretary of state, writing that “of the 13 Clinton speeches that fetched $500,000 or more, only two occurred during the years his wife was not secretary of state.”

In 2011, Mr. Clinton made $13.3 million in speaking fees for 54 speeches, the majority of which were made overseas, the author writes. Among the connections he tries to draw is a $750,000 speaking fee to Mr. Clinton by the Swedish telecom company Ericsson and a State Department list of new sanctions on Iran that did not include telecom.

Mr. Schweizer, president of the Government Accountability Institute, is the author of the 2013 book “Extortion: How Politicians Extract Your Money, Buy Votes, and Line Their Own Pockets,” and “Throw Them All Out” about elected officials receiving insider stock tips.

Subject: 2015 Year In Review

Dear Friends –

As we approach the end of 2015, we wanted to give you a brief recap of the year. Building upon decades of hard work between our two nations -- and millions of people to people ties -- we have had a transformative year in US/India relations, further broadening and deepening our partnership in so many areas. It was also a year of firsts and many high points.

President Obama was the first US President to be the Chief Guest for India's Republic Day ceremonies in January. Months later, Secretary of Defense Carter was the first Defense Secretary to visit an Indian military command. And, recently, Indian Minister of Defense Parrikar was the first Indian Defense Minister to visit Pacific Command, and then land on a US aircraft carrier (the USS Eisenhower) to witness flight operations.

We held the first-ever Strategic and Commercial Dialogue, merging our commercial and strategic issues to help power the growth of both of our countries. We established secure lines between our two National Security Advisors, and between the President and Prime Minister, so that important, time sensitive issues could be tackled directly by our leaders. We launched a trilateral ministerial dialogue between Japan, India and the United States, and we entered into a Joint Strategic Vision for cooperation across the Asia Pacific with India – solidifying our joint commitment to uphold the rules-based order across the Indo-Pacific.

We've moved beyond a buyer/seller relationship in our defense relationship to one of joint production and co-development. Our military forces continued to train at a very high level, further integrating our understanding of how we would each employ force and operate in contested environments. We called upon India for help to evacuate U.S. nationals from Yemen, and we worked together with India and others to help the people of Nepal after a devastating earthquake. We elevated our strategic partnership to "strategic plus" – signifying that we work together at a much higher level, in more places, and on more different subjects.

We exceeded all previous records in two-way trade and foreign direct investments, totaling over $102 billion. Indian companies invested some $11 billion in the US, while US investments in India topped $28 billion. We processed the highest number of visas ever – over 1 million. And more Indian students – over 130,000 -- studied in the US than ever before.

In so many other areas we pushed our cooperation to new heights, bringing together our best experts in health, science, space and innovation. We launched major new initiatives in global health security, tuberculosis, and joint cancer research. We created a new Innovation Forum to build upon the Prime Minister's successful visit to Silicon Valley, and help leverage the use of technology in a wide range of areas, including building new smart cities and modern infrastructure.

And, of course, on the climate and clean energy front, the US and India played a leadership role in constructing and finalizing a historic agreement to combat climate change. We also rolled-out a major new initiative to double our clean energy R&D spending, and we were proud to support India's new solar alliance to fully realize the potential of solar energy. Energy will continue to be one of our biggest areas of cooperation, especially as we move toward implementation of the civil nuclear agreement in the New Year.

As we move into 2016, we do so with optimism and an ambitious agenda for the future. While we are proud of our accomplishments, we know there is much more we can do together. We very much appreciate your continued interest in our work and the progress we have made together – so much of it would not be possible without all of you.

For those of you who want more detail about our activities here, I'd refer you to a few good sources:

ICYMI: The Hill blog: Briefing Room: “Hillary calls for extending CHIP funding”

By Jesse Byrnes

February 12, 2015

Hillary Clinton is pushing for Congress to reauthorize the federal government's child healthcare program, lending her support to congressional Democrats looking to keep the program around.

"[D]espite strong bipartisan support, we are concerned that gridlock in Washington and unrelated disputes over the Affordable Care Act could prevent an extension of the program," Clinton and former GOP Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) wrote in an op-ed in The New York Times on Thursday.

"As parents, grandparents and former legislators, we believe that partisan politics should never stand between our kids and quality health care," the pair added.

Clinton, the presumed 2016 Democratic presidential frontrunner, is calling on Congress to extend the Children's Health Insurance Program's (CHIP) funding for the next four years, labeling the approximately $10 billion expense "an investment in our children that will pay off for decades to come."

Senate Democrats have launched their own push to reauthorize the program, signing on as co-sponsors of a bill that would extend funding through 2019. Currently, the program's funding runs out at the end of September. A companion bill was also introduced in the House on Thursday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The program, which has been around for the better part of two decades, covers about 10 million children. Some Republicans have cast CHIP as duplicative given benefits under ObamaCare, and say additional subsidies and eligibility under Medicaid make the program as unnecessary.

"If CHIP is not reauthorized, more families will be hit with higher costs. As many as two million children could lose coverage altogether. Millions more will have fewer health care benefits and much higher out-of-pocket costs, threatening access to needed health services," Clinton and Frist wrote.

"And because families without adequate insurance often miss out on preventive care and instead receive more expensive treatment in hospital emergency rooms, all of us will be likely to end up paying part of the bill," they added.

The op-ed also marks the second time in as many weeks that Clinton has jumped into a healthcare debate. Last week she tweeted that "#vaccineswork" after two possible 2016 Republican contenders, Gov. Chris Christie (N.J.) and Sen. Rand Paul (Ky.) suggested that parents should have some choice on whether to immunize their children.

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON: FIGHTING FOR AMERICA'S WORKERS

"This is the country where if you work hard, you can make it. And each generation is supposed to have it a little better than the one before." – Hillary Clinton, 10/23/14

- Hillary Clinton has stood up and fought for American workers her entire life, reflecting her belief that our country's future depends on a strong and successful middle class.
- Clinton worked to close tax loopholes and called for eliminating "any tax break that promotes or rewards outsourcing." Hillary also supported legislation to discourage outsourcing in the private sector and to restrict federal agencies from outsourcing work.
- Clinton proposed a $1 billion per year innovation fund to encourage states to develop family leave and paid leave policies, and also called for providing paid parental leave to all federal employees.
- Clinton cofounded the bipartisan Senate Manufacturing Caucus and fought to bring new manufacturing technology to small and medium-sized businesses, which would help to create jobs and spur manufacturing growth.
- Clinton stood up against unfair Chinese trade practices and voted in favor of authorizing action on Chinese imports if the Chinese government did not reform its currency practices.
- Clinton worked to expand job training opportunities for workers and led efforts to bring together local businesses, governments, educational institutions and labor organizations to collaborate on new programs to train workers for modern technology jobs.
- Clinton backed efforts to expand protections for workers' pensions and to protect overtime pay for working Americans.
- Clinton fought to strengthen safety protections for coal miners and worked to secure health coverage for laid off and retired steelworkers.
- Clinton worked to give all American workers the opportunity to easily save for the future. Hillary proposed creating "American Retirement Accounts" that would give workers greater security on their savings and increase flexibility in making investments.

BOTTOM LINE: Hillary Clinton's life has been about fighting to protect and lift up American workers and their families. Hillary's vision for our future is reflected by her efforts to ensure everyone has a fair shot at the American Dream.

TALKING POINTS: BLACK HISTORY MONTH: HILLARY CLINTON FIGHTING FOR CIVIL RIGHTS

BACKGROUND: February is Black History Month, when we honor the struggle, progress, and contributions of African Americans. Throughout her entire career, Hillary Clinton has been a strong champion of the African American community, working to ensure all Americans enjoy the same rights and opportunities.

KEY POINTS:

Hillary Clinton has worked her entire life to ensure that all Americans have equal access to our country's rights and freedoms.

When Hillary was a teenager, she had the privilege of seeing Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. speak and recalled that "he challenged all of us there that evening, as he did throughout his life, to stay awake during the great civil rights revolution that was sweeping our country."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton has consistently advocated in favor of voting rights and repeatedly fought to expand access to the polls to make it easier for everyone to vote. She also led efforts to guarantee that every vote is counted, by updating electronic voting machines.

Clinton has called for more equity in America's criminal justice system. In the wake of unrest in Ferguson, Missouri, Hillary Clinton delivered bold comments that "got personal by asking whites to put themselves in the shoes of black Americans." Hillary asked people to "imagine… if a third of all white men – just look at this room and take one-third – went to prison during their lifetime. Imagine that. That is the reality in the lives of so many of our fellow Americans in so many of the communities in which they live."

As a candidate for president in 2007, she proposed making changes to drug sentencing laws and noted in particular that "the scales of justice are seriously out of balance when it comes to charging, sentencing and punishing African Americans." In the Senate, she also fought to strengthen community policing programs and end racial profiling.

In the face of a Supreme Court that in 2007 "turned its back on the promise of Brown vs. Board of Education that students of different racial backgrounds deserve an opportunity to attend school together," Hillary Clinton proposed a plan to help every school voluntarily work for a more diverse student body.

Hillary fought against attempts to weaken civil rights through our nation's Justice Department. She spoke out against federal judicial nominees like Leslie Southwick, whom she said had "demonstrated a lack of respect and understanding for the civil rights of all Americans, and particular indifference towards the real and enduring evils of discrimination against African Americans."

She has boldly sounded the alarm about the inequities that still exist between African Americans and whites, such as disparities in the number of uninsured children, people living in poverty, and college enrollment for high school graduates.

Hillary has honored the history of African Americans by introducing legislation to establish a Civil Rights History Project and by cosponsoring bills that created the National Museum of African American History and Culture.

TALKING POINTS: TOUGH ON TERRORISM

MESSAGE: In a changing and unpredictable world, Hillary Clinton's leadership on issues of national security has kept America secure and helped make the world a safer place.

KEY POINTS:

Hillary Clinton has recognized the threat and taken a tough stance against ISIS saying, "we have to do everything we can to…marginalize extremists through the Middle East."

As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton worked through diplomatic channels to help the United States fight terrorism and safeguard our national security.

- Secretary Clinton made the case for the raid to bring Osama bin Laden to justice.
- Clinton built relationships with key players in the Middle East and funded counterterrorism training initiatives.
- Through negotiations with Russia, Clinton successfully worked to reduce the number of nuclear missile launchers in the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Clinton built and maintained a coalition to enact the toughest sanctions in Iran's history in order to encourage Iran to abandon, or at least stall, its nuclear program.

- Clinton negotiated the Gaza cease-fire between Israelis and Palestinians, helping avert an all-out war in Gaza.

- Clinton played a role to end the war in Iraq and begin a transition to civilian society in Afghanistan.

- Clinton instituted new roles at the State Department to fight terrorism:
  - Clinton created the Center for Strategic Counterterrorism Communications to combat Al-Qaeda's growing influence online.
  - Clinton established the Bureau of Counterterrorism to advance counterterrorism objectives and our national security.

- Clinton identified and led on important issues which affect our national security, such as the global empowerment of women and climate change.
  - Clinton worked to empower women and girls around the world to participate in their economies. This helps make economies stronger and more stable.
  - Clinton prioritized addressing climate change in her time at the State Department. Weather events caused by climate change can lead to famine and destroyed infrastructure, which increase instability and unrest.

Serving as a United States Senator representing New York during September 11, 2001, Hillary Clinton made it a priority to urge the pursuit of justice against Al Qaeda and improve our nation's efforts to combat terrorism.

RECENT STATEMENTS ON ISIS:

Clinton: "Canada, the United States, and many other nations are working together to stop the spread of ISIS and other violent jihadi extremists in the region." "Canada, the United States, and many other nations are working together to stop the spread of ISIS and other violent jihadi extremists in the region. These militants are targeting religious and ethnic minorities, kidnapping and beheading civilians, persecuting and enslaving women, and attracting foreign fighters, including some with Western passports from the United States and Canada who could easily return home. This fight is crucial, and more broadly, we have to do everything we can to empower moderates and marginalize extremists throughout the Middle East and the wider Muslim world." [Sec. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Global Perspectives – Winnipeg, 1/21/15]

Clinton: "There is a distorted and dangerous strain of extremism within the Muslim world that continues to spread." "We are in a contest of ideas and values. And who are we contesting against? Well we are not contesting against the vast majority of Muslims. Islam itself is not the adversary. And the vast majority of Muslims are peaceful and tolerant people. Here amongst us this afternoon we see that every day, in Canada and the United States, with so many of our neighbors and fellow citizens. But we can't close our eyes to the fact that at this time in our world history there is a distorted and dangerous strain of extremism within the Muslim world that continues to spread. Now its adherents may be few in number. But they have the capacity to cause profound damage, most especially, to their own communities. With these vicious few, we are confronting an ideology of hate – a worldview based on tearing down and dividing rather than building up and bringing together based on a claim to absolute truth and total intolerance for the beliefs and rights of their fellow human beings." [Sec. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Global Perspectives – Winnipeg, 1/21/15]

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON TOPS NEW NATIONAL POLL

BACKGROUND: A new Bloomberg Politics/Saint Anselm College New Hampshire poll conducted January 31 – February 5, 2015 finds that Hillary Clinton leads the field of potential Democratic presidential candidates in New Hampshire and maintains sky-high approval ratings.

KEY POINTS:

- Even as right-wing attack groups throw everything but the kitchen sink at Hillary Clinton, she continues to connect with Democrats, Independents and Americans of all backgrounds who are hungry for her experience, leadership and vision. Because of Hillary Clinton's years of public service, her strong record as a leader, and her commitment to fighting for middle class workers and their families, she has the support of so many Americans.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- According to the poll, 56% of the likely Democratic primary voters polled in New Hampshire said that Hillary Clinton was their first choice for president, 41% ahead of the next potential candidate.
- Hillary Clinton is viewed favorably by 89% of likely Democratic primary voters.

THE BIG PICTURE:

- This latest poll is in line with what others polls and pundits have been showing for months – that Hillary Clinton has unprecedented support, despite the onslaught of Republican attacks against her.
  - A Fusion Massive Millennial poll conducted January 6-11, 2015 finds that 57% of young Democrats polled chose Hillary Clinton as their preferred Democratic presidential nominee, 47% higher than the next potential candidate. The poll also shows that in a head-to-head matchup with young Republicans' preferred GOP nominee, Mitt Romney, who eventually decided not to run, Hillary Clinton would win by double digits, 55%-31%.
  - A Bloomberg Politics/Des Moines Register Iowa poll conducted January 26-29, 2015 finds that 56% of the likely Democratic caucus-goers polled in Iowa said that Hillary Clinton was their first choice for president, 40% ahead of the next potential candidate. The poll also shows that Hillary Clinton is viewed favorably by 84% of Democratic likely caucus-goers.
  - An ABC News/Washington Post poll conducted January 12-15, 2015 finds that Hillary Clinton leads each of the top potential GOP candidates in hypothetical matchups by double digits. According to the poll, Hillary leads Jeb Bush 54%-41%, Mitt Romney 55%-40%, Chris Christie 53%-40%, Rand Paul 54%-41%, and Mike Huckabee 56%-39%.
  - For 17 out of the past 18 years, Hillary Clinton has been named Americans' Most Admired Woman, according to a Gallup poll from December 8-11, 2014.
  - Clinton is extremely popular among Democrats: an NBC/Marist poll from July 7-13, 2014 puts her favorability/unfavorability rating in Iowa at 89 percent/6 percent; in New Hampshire it's even higher, at 94 percent/4 percent.
  - In polls conducted this summer in Ohio, New Jersey and Florida, Hillary Clinton had commanding leads over potential 2016 GOP contenders.
  - According to a Quinnipiac press release on the Ohio poll, "Secretary Clinton, on the other hand, is almost everyone's favorite candidate."
  - Regarding the New Jersey poll, a Quinnipiac official stated, "As Gov. Christopher Christie traipses around the nation, his presidential potential seems alive, but former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, the adopted girl next door, easily beats him in his home state."
  - Based on the Florida poll, CNN reported that "Hillary Clinton is the clear 2016 frontrunner in the nation's largest presidential battleground state."

MAJOR INTERNATIONAL INITIATIVES

Clinton Development Initiative

Malawi

The current biggest issue is the impact of President Mutharika's sudden death yesterday and whether there will be a smooth transition to the vice-president, who is no longer a member of the ruling party.

CDI had a visit from Kartikeya Maheshwari, an Indian businessman who has an interest in partnering with CDI to operate an agricultural products distribution business. The head of African development for Brookings in Malawi will see CDI's projects next week. A staff member of the Howard G. Buffet Foundation will be visiting later this month.

Harvesting and delivery of soya continues on the commercial farm and among smallholders in the Anchor Farm Project.

Rwanda (CHDI)

On the Mount Meru Soyco Ltd. site, the foundation of the solvent extraction plant is being laid, to be followed by the foundation for the refinery.

The planting period is now nearly complete for the AGRA project. Data compilation from last season's trials is underway.

At the fruit nursery, new seed beds have been installed, and the full grafting operation will begin in the next three months.

Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative

The Investment Committee of the Colombia Acceso Fund has approved its second investment—$455,000 USD in Fontel S.A., a communication services provider. The funds will be principally allocated to the opening of twenty new service centers, which provide phone, Internet, and other office services in Bogotá and in the Caribbean region of Colombia. The investment is expected to generate sixty-six new formal direct jobs. Fontel's business model will also have a high social impact as it enables access for bottom of the pyramid (BoP) communities to use the Internet and other basic telecommunication and financial services. Thirty percent of Fontel's client base consists of low-income populations and thirty-five percent of its stores are located in BoP neighborhoods throughout the Caribbean region of Colombia.

Clinton Global Initiative

Membership/Sponsorship

- Since the last update on March 2, Ambassador Angelopoulos ($500,000), Ford Foundation ($400,000), and Delos Living ($300,000) have renewed their sponsorships for the 2012 Annual Meeting.

- CGI currently has 235 paying members registered for 2012. The renewal rate is eight percent higher than at this time last year, although the number of new member registrants is slightly behind (-11).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CGI U

- The fifth annual CGI University meeting was a success by all accounts.
- 1,116 students attended CGI U 2012, representing 327 colleges and universities from 97 countries. Of the 1,116 students in attendance, 289 were international students, the highest percentage of international students represented at any CGI U meeting.
- The meeting received coverage in the following outlets: The Washington Post, The Daily Show with Jon Stewart, Associated Press, ABC News, CBS, NBC, MSNBC, Bloomberg BusinessWeek, Fast Company, Forbes, Seattle Times, Sioux City Journal, USA Today, NPR, Sirius XM Radio, and WTOP.
- The CGI U Service Project went off smoothly, and both Rebuilding Together and the USO were very pleased with the turnout and results of the day.
- A complete wrap-up report will be delivered to YOU in the coming weeks.

CGI America

- CGI America has received 73 commitment progress reports out of 111 commitments made in 2011.

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Speech in Orlando, FL 08/18/08

Hello All,
Just got off the phone with our tracker, Evan, on the ground in Orlando, FL. Below are the notes from our call.

Big Highlights

- Attacks on Obama and promises to vets largely a repetition, verbatim, of speech to DAV 2 weeks ago; plus a section on Georgia
    - Again hits Obama on judgment and "shifting positions", says "not content to merely predict failure in Iraq, [Obama] tried to legislate failure"
    - On Georgia, repeats warnings of Russia hitting BTC pipeline, says we must view them a "threat to the peace"
- Major changes from prev. speech
    - Directly addresses Obama charge he'll privatize VA; adamant that this is an expansion
    - Directly addresses Obama criticsm GI bill, says it would've been politically easier to sign GI bill but "I sought a better bill"
- Says he will "save billions" by vetoing every earmark, which can be used for vets care
- Repeats blames on Congress for exacerbating problems in vet health care and energy problems
- Accuses Obama of not "listen[ing] to the troops on the ground when they say ... 'Let us win'"
- Compares conflict in Georgia to Balkan conflict

REMARKS BY JOHN MCCAIN TO THE 109TH ANNUAL VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES NATIONAL CONVENTION

Thank you all very much. National Commander George Lisicki, thank you for the kind introduction. Ladies Auxiliary President Virginia Carmen, Incoming National Commander Glen Gardner, Incoming Ladies Auxiliary

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

President Dixie Hild, Adjutant General Gunner Kent, Executive Director Bob Wallace: I thank you all for the warm welcome. I am honored to be in the company of all my fellow members of the VFW, and especially anyone here who might hail from Post 7401 in Chandler, Arizona.

I'm proud to count many of you in this room as personal friends, including my good friend retired Marine Corps Sergeant Major Paul Chevalier of New Hampshire. And there's another gentleman here I know you'll want to welcome. He's as fine a friend as a man could have in a tough spot, Lieutenant Colonel Orson Swindle of the United States Marine Corps.

All of us take pride in being members of this great organization. After its founding in 1914, the VFW served many of the more than four million American veterans of the First World War. Today just one of those veterans survives, a man of 107 named Frank Buckles. Frank lives in West Virginia. And I have a feeling that word will reach him if we all join in a round of applause for the last doughboy.

In all the years since, the men and women of the VFW have stayed faithful to their mission of serving those who have served their country. In Europe, Asia, the Middle East, and elsewhere, America's veterans have faced different enemies, but they have always found the same friend and ally in the VFW. All of us returned from war with a few experiences we'd gladly forget, but the friendships and camaraderie we brought home are forever. For keeping us all together, and helping those most in need, we're all in the debt of the VFW.

The men and women of the VFW know the value of freedom, because you have been its protectors. You were there when your country needed you. You shouldered heavy burdens and accepted great risks. I'm sure many of you will also recall from your experiences in war, as I do from mine, that when you're somewhere on the other side of the world in the service of America you pay attention to the news from back home. It affects morale. And even during this election season, with sharp differences on the wisdom and success of the surge in Iraq, Americans need to speak as one in praise of the men and women who fight our battles. They are the best among us, as you were before them, and I know you will join me in applauding the courage and skill that will see America through to victory.

Though victory in Iraq is finally in sight, a great deal still depends on the decisions and good judgment of the next president. The hard-won gains of our troops hang in the balance. The lasting advantage of a peaceful and democratic ally in the heart of the Middle East could still be squandered by hasty withdrawal and arbitrary timelines. And this is one of many problems in the shifting positions of my opponent, Senator Obama.

With less than three months to go before the election, a lot of people are still trying to square Senator Obama's varying positions on the surge in Iraq. First, he opposed the surge and confidently predicted that it would fail. Then he tried to prevent funding for the troops who carried out the surge. Not content to merely predict failure in Iraq, my opponent tried to legislate failure. This was back when supporting America's efforts in Iraq entailed serious political risk. It was a clarifying moment. It was a moment when political self-interest and the national interest parted ways. For my part, with so much in the balance, it was an easy call. As I said at the time, I would rather lose an election than lose a war.

Thanks to the courage and sacrifice of our soldiers, sailors, airmen, and Marines and to brave Iraqi fighters the surge has succeeded. And yet Senator Obama still cannot quite bring himself to admit his own failure in judgment. Nor has he been willing to heed the guidance of General Petraeus, or to listen to our troops on the ground when they say -- as they have said to me on my trips to Iraq: "Let us win, just let us win." Instead, Senator Obama commits the greater error of insisting that even in hindsight, he would oppose the surge. Even in retrospect, he would choose the path of retreat and failure for America over the path of success and victory. In short, both candidates in this election pledge to end this war and bring our troops home. The great difference is that I intend to win it first.

Behind all of these claims and positions by Senator Obama lies the ambition to be president. What's less apparent is the judgment to be commander in chief. And in matters of national security, good judgment will be at a premium in the term of the next president -- as we were all reminded ten days ago by events in the nation of Georgia.

It's been a while since most Americans -- including most of our leaders and diplomats -- have viewed Russia as a threat to the peace. But the Russian government's assault on a small democratic neighbor shows why this needs revising. As I have long warned, Russia under the rule of Vladimir Putin is becoming more aggressive toward the now democratic nations that broke free of the old Soviet empire.

Russia also holds vast energy wealth. And this heavy influence in the oil and gas market has become a political weapon that Russia is clearly prepared to use. Georgia stands at a strategic crossroads in the Caucasus. The Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan pipeline, which brings oil from the Caspian to points west, traverses Georgia. And if that pipeline were destroyed or controlled by Russia, global energy supplies would be even more vulnerable to Russian influence with serious consequences on the world energy market.

For some time now, I have been making the case for a dramatic acceleration of domestic energy production. With high prices and growing demand for oil and gas, Americans cannot remain dependent upon others for the most vital of commodities. Now we are reminded that energy policy is also a matter of the highest priority not only for our economy, but for our nation's security. Disruptions of supply abroad can suddenly raise energy prices, inflicting great harm on our economy and on America workers. And in the term of the next president, skillful handling of such a crisis could be the difference between temporary hardship and far-reaching disaster.

When Russia first invaded Georgia, some people may have wondered why events in this part of the world should be any concern of ours. After all, Georgia may seem a small, remote and obscure place. But many of you served in places that once seemed remote and obscure. And the veterans of foreign wars know better than anyone how inattention to small crises can invite much larger ones. There are many reasons why the Russian invasion of Georgia is of grave concern to America and to our allies. Above all, Georgia is a struggling democracy where Soviet tyranny is still fresh in memory. There are reports now of Georgian villages being razed, civilians being rounded up, and innocent civilians shot. We have seen such things before, as in the Balkans and in earlier periods of European history, and now we must ensure that events in Georgia do not unfold into a tragedy of greater scale. When young democracies are threatened or attacked, and innocent civilians are targeted, they should be able to count on the free world for support and solidarity.

If I am elected president, they will have that support. And in cooperation with our friends and allies in Europe, we will make it clear to Russia's rulers that acts of violence and intimidation come at a heavy cost. There will be no place among G-8 nations, or in the WTO, for a modern Russia that acts at times like the old Soviet Union. The Cold War is over, the Soviet empire is gone, and neither one is missed. Least of all is that empire missed by the once captive nations of Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Ukraine, and Georgia. These brave young democracies have joined the free world, and they are not going back.

Through decades of struggle, free nations prevailed over tyranny in large measure because of the sacrifices of the men and women of the United States armed forces. And it will fall to the next commander in chief to make good on the obligation our government accepts every time any man or woman enters the military, and again when they receive their DD 214. Those we depend on as troops should know, when they become veterans, that they can depend on us. Honoring this obligation will require leadership. And I pledge to you that as president I will lead -- from the front -- to reform our VA system and make sure that veterans receive the respect and care they have earned.

The Walter Reed scandal was a disgrace unworthy of this nation -- and I intend to make sure that nothing like it is ever repeated. There are other problems as well that have not received as much media attention. And my administration will do the hard and necessary work of fixing them, even when the press and the public are not watching.

Reform begins with appointing a Secretary of Veterans Affairs who is a leader of the highest caliber, and who listens to veterans and veterans' service organizations. My VA secretary must be a forceful advocate for veterans and forthright advisor to me, so we can make the right choices about budgeting, health care, and other veterans' benefit issues. He or she will also need to be a high-energy leader, too, because we'll have a lot of work to do in improving service to veterans.

Veterans must be treated fairly and expeditiously as they seek compensation for disability or illness. We owe them compassion and hands-on care in their transition to civilian life. We owe them training, rehabilitation, and education. We owe their families, parents and caregivers our concern and support. Veterans should never be deprived of quality medical care and mental health care coverage for illness or injury incurred as a result of their service to our country.

As president, I will do all that is in my power to ensure that those who serve today, and those who have served in the past, have access to the highest quality health, mental health and rehabilitative care in the world. And I will not accept a situation in which veterans are denied access to care on account of travel distances, backlogs of appointments, and years of pending disability evaluation and claims. We should no longer tolerate requiring veterans to make an appointment to stand in one line for a ticket to stand in another.

I'm not here to tell you that there is a cost that is too high to be paid in the care of our nation's veterans. I will make sure that Congress funds the VA health care budget in a sufficient, timely, and predictable manner. But I will say that every increase in funding must be matched by increases in accountability, both at the VA and in Congress. And this requires an end to certain practices and abuses that serve neither our veterans, our country, nor the reputation of Congress itself.

Exactly because funding VA programs command bipartisan support, some in the Congress like to attach unrelated appropriations and earmarks to VA bills. The result is to mix vital national priorities with wasteful and often worthless political pork. Earmarks show up in bills of every kind, and not just VA bills. That's how we end up budgeting hundreds of millions of dollars for bridges to nowhere, or lesser sums for Woodstock museums and the like. When that earmark for a million bucks to fund a Woodstock museum didn't come through, I don't imagine that many veterans had to change their vacation plans. And the principle here is simple: Public money should serve the public good. If it's me sitting in the Oval Office, at the Resolute desk, those wasteful spending bills are going the way of all earmarks, straight back to the Congress with a veto. [PARAPHRASE - NOT IN PREPARED REMARKS - You will know their names. I will make them famous and we'll make it clear that this wasteful spending must end. And that will save billions, which can be used for veterans' care.]

When we make it clear to Congress that no earmark bill will be signed into law, that will save many billions of dollars that can be applied to essential priorities, and above all to the care of our veterans. But reform doesn't end there. We must also modernize our disability system to make sure that eligible service members receive benefits quickly, based on clear, predictable, and fair standards. And we must address the problems of capacity and access within our VA health care system. While this will involve a wide range of initiatives, I believe there is a simple and direct reform we should make right away.

My administration will create a Veterans' Care Access Card to be used by veterans with illness or injury incurred during their military service, and by those with lower incomes. This card will provide those without timely access to VA facilities the option of using high-quality health-care providers near their homes. For many veterans, the closest VA facility isn't close enough. And many of their local providers are already familiar with the most common needs of veterans. Often, all that prevents them from receiving local care is a system for sharing medical records among VA, DOD, and civilian hospitals and doctors. My reform will improve care, reduce risks, and broaden access all at the same time.

This card is not intended to either replace the VA or privatize veterans' health care, as some have wrongly charged. I believe the VA should always be there to provide top-quality care for our veterans. And I believe that the VA should continue to provide broad-spectrum health care to eligible veterans, in addition to specialized care in areas such as spinal injuries, prosthetics, and blindness -- services in which the VA sets the standard in medical care.

Even so, there are veterans eligible for care who are not currently able to receive it, on account of distance, wait times, or the absence of certain specialties. And for this group, the new card I propose will offer better alternatives, to provide the benefits they have earned.

Reform must also recognize that greater care is needed for certain types of injuries. In the Senate, I co-authored the Wounded Warrior Act, which was the first major legislative initiative to address post-traumatic stress disorder and traumatic brain injury. As president, I will build on this legislation to improve screening and treatment for these severe injuries suffered by many in Iraq and Afghanistan.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The VA must also broaden its care for the women who are entering the armed forces in greater numbers than ever. The growing ranks of women in uniform have left the VA lagging behind in the services it provides. And here the Veterans Care Access Card will prove especially valuable, affording women medical options while the VA improves capacity and expands services.

These are among the elements of my reform agenda for the VA system. And today, as other occasions, I have stated in the plainest, most straightforward terms that the Veterans Health Care Access Card will expand existing benefits. I don't expect this will deter the Obama campaign from misrepresenting my proposals, but lest there be any doubt you have my pledge: My reforms would not force anyone to go to a non-VA facility. They will not signal privatization of the VA. And they will not replace any scheduled expansion of the VA network -- including those facilities designed to serve veterans living in rural and remote areas.

I suppose from my opponent's vantage point, veterans concerns are just one more issue to be spun or worked to advantage. This would explain why he has also taken liberties with my position on the GI Bill. In its initial version, that bill failed to address the number one education request that I've heard from career service members and their families -- the freedom to transfer their benefits to a spouse or a child. The bill also did nothing to retain the young officer and enlisted leaders who form the backbone of our all-volunteer force.

As a political proposition, it would have much easier for me to have just signed on to what I considered flawed legislation. But the people of Arizona, and of all America, expect more from their representatives than that, and instead I sought a better bill. I'm proud to say that the result is a law that better serves our military, better serves military families, and better serves the interests of our country.

No one who has worn the uniform of his or her country can ever take these matters lightly. We all learned an ethic in the service of looking after one another, of leaving no one behind, and this commitment did not end when we left the service. As a matter of duty and of honor, whatever our commitments to veterans cost, if I am president those commitments will be kept.

The next president will have many responsibilities to the American people, and I take them all seriously. But I have one responsibility that outweighs all the others and that is to use whatever talents I possess, and every resource God has granted me to protect the security of this great and good nation from all enemies foreign and domestic.

It is every veteran's hope that should their children be called upon to answer a call to arms, the battle will be necessary and the field well chosen. But that is not their responsibility. It belongs to the government that called them. As it once was for us, their honor will be in their answer not their summons. Whatever we think about how and why we went to war in Iraq, we are all humbled by and grateful for their example. They now deserve the distinction of the best Americans, and we owe them a debt we can never fully repay. We can only offer the small tribute of our humility and our commitment to do all that we can do, in less trying and costly circumstances, to help keep this nation worthy of their sacrifice.

Many of them have served multiple tours in Iraq and Afghanistan. Many had their tours extended. Many returned to combat sooner than they had been led to expect. It was a sad and hard thing to ask so much more of Americans who have already given more than their fair share to the defense of our country. Few of them and their families will have received the news about additional and longer deployments without aiming a few appropriate complaints in the general direction of people like me, who helped make the decision to send them there. And then they shouldered a rifle or climbed in a cockpit and risked everything -- everything -- to accomplish their mission, to protect another people's freedom and our own country from harm.

It is a privilege beyond measure to live in a country served by them. I have had the good fortune to know personally a great many brave and selfless patriots who sacrificed and shed blood to defend America. But I have known none braver or better than those who do so today. They are our inspiration, as I suspect all of you were once theirs. And I pray to a loving God that He bless and protect them. Thank you.

MAJOR DOMESTIC INITIATIVES

Alliance for a Healthier Generation

The Alliance is working closely with Kaiser Permanente on a partnership to launch the Healthy Schools Program in their eight key markets.

Two articles on the impact of the Healthy Schools Program will appear in the March issue of the CDC's peer-reviewed journal, Preventing Chronic Disease.

The Alliance is working with the Clinton Presidential Center team in Little Rock to host a pre-screening of a new HBO documentary, Weight of the Nation, on May 2.

MAJOR INTERNATIONAL INITIATIVES

Clinton Development Initiative

Malawi

The President of AGRA, Dr. Namanga Ngongi, is in Malawi this week and is visiting with smallholder farmers who are partners in the Anchor Farm Project. Dr. Ngongi will have a full update on the progress to date of the commercial farming and smallholder operations and will hear from smallholders on the specific impacts the project is having on their livelihoods.

CDI is finalizing a small volume sale of carbon credits through a Carbon Trade Exchange buyer. The buyer has a record of making regular purchases, so it is promising that the buyer is interested in and has begun buying credits from CDI's project.

Rwanda (CHDI)

Following the groundbreaking of Mt. Meru Soyco Ltd., construction has begun on the ground, including drilling a bore hole, excavating the boundary wall, cleaning and leveling the site, mobilizing the civil contractor team, and getting all necessary documents in order.

With regards to the AGRA project, the current harvesting work is being finalized and preparations are underway for the next season. Farmers are mobilized and seeds are now available.

On February 8, the transfer of the government land in the name of RFCC was approved. With that resolution, the CHDI team can now apply for a construction permit. CHDI is moving forward with the next steps in this regard.

Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative

Mexico

A Ganar, the pilot project that CGSGI participates in with Fundación Carlos Slim in Chihuahua, Mexico, will have its first graduation on March 8. At the event, 301 youth from the first phase of the project will graduate. A Ganar — which means "to win" and "to earn" in Spanish — utilizes soccer and other team sports to help youth age 16-24 re-enter the formal education system, and learn the entrepreneurial skills necessary to enter the workforce in the future. To date, 528 youth have enrolled, 72 job placements have been made (as nursing assistants, administrative assistants and junior chefs), and 41 have gone back to school.

The goal of this multinational program, supported by the Multilateral Investment Fund (MIF) of the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB), the Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative, Fundación Carlos Slim, the PepsiCo Foundation of Mexico, and other donors, is to combat youth unemployment through the application of an integrated job training program, transforming lessons and skills developed through sports into marketable job skills.

Haiti

The Haiti Development Fund is now under CGSGI management. This will allow synergies in processes and sharing best practices with the Colombian fund, Fondo Acceso.

Clinton Global Initiative

Membership/Sponsorship

NRG Energy, Duke Energy, and Blue Cross Blue Shield of North Carolina have all renewed their CGI sponsorship at the $350,000 level for the 2012 Annual Meeting. Procter & Gamble has also renewed its CGI sponsorship for $500,000 for both 2012 and 2013.

CGI currently has 208 paying members for 2012. As was previously reported, a change in the methodology by which members are renewed makes year-to-year comparisons difficult. Nonetheless, the current renewal rate is 6 percent higher at this time than last year, although we are running slightly behind on new member registrants (-7).

CGI Winter Meeting

The CGI Winter Meeting will be held March 15th at the Sheraton Hotel in New York City.

The plenary panelists include:

- Ashley Judd, board member, Population Services International
- M. Sanjayan, lead scientist, The Nature Conservancy
- Bobbi Silten, president, Gap Foundation and senior vice president, Global Responsibility, Gap Inc.
- Derek Yach, senior vice president, Global Health and Agriculture Policy, PepsiCo

There are 275 registrants for the meeting, including 88 new member prospects. Our goal is to have 330 total registrants by March 15th.

CGI U

Usher, Kathryn Schultz (author of Being Wrong), and Luis Moreno have all confirmed their participation at the fifth meeting of CGI U.

The CGI U service project has been confirmed. We will be working in partnership with Rebuilding Together and the USO. The service project rally will be hosted at Kelly Miller Middle School located in the Lincoln Heights neighborhood of Washington, D.C.

The Arrive Magazine cover story featuring you and CGI U was released on March 1st and will be available on all Amtrak trains through the months of March and April.

CGI America

We have started sending out invitations for CGI America and expect sto have approximately 1,000 participants at this year's meeting.

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton Praises Gay Marriage Decision and Hounds GOP // TIME // Sam Frizell – June 27, 2015

"Equality triumphed, and America triumphed"

Hillary Clinton praised the Supreme Court decision to guarantee same-sex marriages on Friday night and forcefully condemned the Republicans' response to the ruling, warning the GOP presidential field not to turn LGBT issues into a "political football for this 2016 campaign."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It was an emotional roller coaster of a day, Clinton said. “This morning, love triumphed in the highest court in our land. Equality triumphed, and America triumphed.”

“Instead of trying to turn back the clock,” Clinton continued, Republicans “should be joining us in saying no to discrimination once and for all.”

Clinton’s comments on Friday evening were her first public remarks in the wake of Friday’s Supreme Court ruling that the Constitution guarantees the right for same-sex couples to marry. Her campaign issued a statement Friday in support of the decision and touted it on social media.

Nearly all the Republican presidential hopefuls have criticized the Supreme Court’s decision, with Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker calling it a “grave mistake” and Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee naming the Supreme Court “an imperial court.” The Republicans have said the issue should be decided by the states, and several called for a constitutional amendment.

Among the general electorate, the issue of gay marriage favors the Democrats: nearly 60% of Americans support same-sex marriage, a count that has grown rapidly in recent years. It is likely to be a boon for Democrats in a general election.

Clinton called Friday’s Supreme Court decision a ruling that reinforced American values. “Today was not about discovering new rights—it was about getting closer to the ideals that have defined our nation from the very beginning,” she said.

Much of the former secretary of state’s address was a preview of what her stump speech in a general election might sound like. Clinton ticked off a list of issues that she said made the Republicans sounds like the “party of the past,” including gun control, immigration reform, same-sex marriage and the Affordable Care Act.

She praised the Supreme Court for upholding the Obamacare subsidies in states with federal-run exchanges, and called on all states to accept funding for Medicaid expansion.

The Supreme Court ruled Friday that the Constitution guarantees a right to same-sex marriage, bringing an end to a patchwork of marriage laws across the U.S. and decades of activism pushing for marriage equality.

Friday was Clinton’s first stop of her presidential election campaign in Virginia, a purple state that Barack Obama won in 2008 and 2012. It will be a key state for Clinton in the 2016 election if she wins the Democratic nomination, one that she will likely need to defeat a Republican opponent.

Virginia’s governor, Terry McAuliffe is a close ally of the Clintons and will be a key player for her in the state. McAuliffe introduced Clinton with an effusive speech, calling her a “tenacious fighter.”

“You know why else I love this woman? She’s been beaten up, she’s been knocked down, but every time she does she gets right back up,” said McAuliffe, echoing an oft-repeated theme of Clinton’s campaign stump speech.

McAuliffe, who vacations with the Clintons, told the crowd when he’s traveling with them and wants a pre-dinner cocktail, “I don’t go looking for Bill Clinton: I go looking for Hillary Clinton, because she’s a lot more fun than him."

Cheering Marriage Decision, Hillary Clinton Heads to Provincetown // NYT // Amy Chozick – June 27, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton transformed her H-and-an-arrow campaign logo into a gay-rights rainbow on Friday to mark the Supreme Court's same-sex marriage ruling. She issued a statement calling the court's decision "an affirmation of the commitment of couples across the country who love one another." Her campaign sells a variety of branded "Hillary" items timed to June's Gay Pride Month.

But on Thursday, Mrs. Clinton will make perhaps her most gay-friendly move: She will visit Provincetown, Mass.

The seaside enclave — in the state that was first to legalize same-sex marriage — has long been a Shangri-La for gay men and lesbians who enjoy raucous, romantic or just relaxing weekends in the scenic city at the northern tip of Cape Cod.

In 2012, the Census reported that Provincetown had 163.1 same-sex couples per 1,000 people, the most of any city in the country.

As much as it may call to mind drag-queen pool parties or kitschy rainbow-festooned nightclubs, Provincetown has served a far more serious purpose: Historically, it was one of the few resort locales where gay men and lesbians could openly enjoy a vacation without the threat of discrimination or worse.

Mrs. Clinton, who maintains strong support among gay people, and whose campaign recently released a video showing same-sex couples before and during their weddings, will attend a fund-raiser in Provincetown hosted by Bryan Rafanelli, an event planner, and Alix Ritchie, a prominent gay-rights activist. The event is part of a string of fund-raisers Mrs. Clinton has arranged in and around Boston in early July.

It was planned weeks ago — but just became extremely well timed.

Hillary Clinton says you can vote in Texas with a concealed-weapon permit, but not a student ID // Politifact // W. Gardner Selby – June 27, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton, campaigning in Texas, called for citizens to be automatically registered to vote at age 18. Speaking at Texas Southern University, Clinton also lashed out at the Texas law reached by the Republican-steered Legislature in 2011 requiring voters to present photo identification at the polls.

Rick Perry, the state's governor into 2015, "signed a law that a federal court said was actually written with the purpose of discriminating against minority voters," Clinton said. Mostly True, PolitiFact in Washington, D.C. recently found, noting that a federal judge had aired that conclusion, though the judge's ruling that the law is unconstitutional remains under appeal.

A reader asked us to consider another Clinton charge from that Houston appearance.

According to a New York Times account of her speech, Clinton said young Texans had been disenfranchised by the voter ID law. "If you want to vote in this state," she said, "you can use a concealed-weapon permit as a valid form of identification, but a valid student ID isn't good enough."

This claim took just a few key strokes and help from a state office to confirm.

Prior to the change in law, Texas law didn't require anyone to present a photo ID to vote. However, Alicia Phillips Pierce, a spokeswoman for the Texas secretary of state, confirmed by email that student ID's previously could have been presented to help officials pin down someone's identity for the purposes of voting though the law did not require anyone to present more than a voter registration card. The old law broadly said a voter could present a "form of identification containing the person's photograph that establishes the person's identity."

The Texas secretary of state's office says on its Frequently Asked Questions web page that the current ID mandate enables a registered voter to cast a ballot at a poll during early voting or on Election Day with one of seven types of a photo ID:

A Texas driver license issued by the Texas Department of Public Safety.

Texas Election Identification Certificate issued by DPS.

Texas personal identification card issued by DPS.

Texas concealed handgun license issued by DPS.

U.S. military identification card containing the person's photograph.

U.S. citizenship certificate containing the person's photograph.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

U.S. passport.

So, yes to voting in Texas with a concealed handgun license but no-go for someone presenting a student ID.

Nationally, the National Conference of State Legislatures said in March 2015, 14 of 34 states with laws requiring voters to show identification at the polls included a student ID option, including three states — Mississippi, Virginia and Wisconsin — that, like Texas, were described by the group as having "strict" photo ID voting laws.

Wondering if a student ID element was ever part of the legislation that became the Texas law, we reviewed the varied versions of Senate Bill 14, authored by Sen. Troy Fraser of Horseshoe Bay and fellow Republicans that advanced in the 2011 legislative session. We found no "student" mentions. Language permitting a state license to carry a concealed handgun to be offered at the polls wasn't in the original Fraser proposal; it was added, though, before the Senate sent the proposal to the House, legislative records show.

Voting by mail

We've noted before that Texas maintains a no-ID element for voting by mail, in 2013 rating True a claim the Texas law doesn't require a person voting by mail to present a photo ID. That's so, we found, for all but first-time voters who did not present a photo ID number or the last four digits of their Social Security number when registering to vote. Those voters who seek to vote by mail can expect to be asked for a copy of their photo ID, yet even they don't have to do so if they are disabled, in the military or living overseas.

A registered voter wishing to ballot by mail must say she or he will be out of her or his home county on Election Day and during the early-voting period or she or he is sick or disabled or will be 65 or older on Election Day or confined in jail though still eligible to vote.

Our ruling

Clinton said: "If you want to vote in" Texas, "you can use a concealed-weapon permit as a valid form of identification, but a valid student ID isn't good enough."

The photo IDs accepted at Texas polling places include the state's concealed-handgun license and not any student IDs. We rate this statement True.

Hillary Clinton, Praising the Court's Marriage Decision, Pits Herself Against 'the Party of the Past' //
National Journal // Emily Schultheis – June 27, 2015

FAIRFAX, Va. — Energized by a major week of policy victories for Democrats, which culminated with the Supreme Court's decision to legalize same-sex marriage nationwide, Hillary Clinton at a stop in Virginia on Friday forcefully drew contrasts between herself and the 2016 Republican field on issues ranging from same-sex marriage and health care to immigration, women's health and gun control laws.

"A lot of the Republicans may talk about having new ideas and fresh faces, but across the board they're the party of the past, not the future," she told a crowd of about 1,800 supporters on George Mason University's campus in Fairfax.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton praised the Supreme Court for its same-sex marriage decision, quoting from Justice Anthony Kennedy's majority opinion. "This morning, love triumphed in the highest court in our land," she said. "Equality triumphed. America triumphed."

Though Friday's event was a fundraiser for the state Democratic Party, which is neutral in the Democratic primaries, it felt like a de facto Hillary Clinton pep rally. The coterie of local and state politicians who spoke before her were effusive in praise, and virtually all of them endorsed or advocated for her on stage.

"I don't know about you, but I made my choice—I'm ready for Hillary," Virginia Sen. Mark Warner said, to applause.

Clinton's speech gave early but clear signs of how she'll paint herself against a Republican opponent if she makes it to the general election, as most assume she will. Clinton denounced a GOP field who, she said, "seemed determined to lead us right back into the past," going after the Republican candidates who had criticized the Court's decision earlier in the day.

"This morning they all decried the Supreme Court's ruling upholding marriage equality—we even heard them call for a constitutional amendment to strip away the right to equality from our gay brothers and sisters," she said, seemingly alluding to amendment proposals from Scott Walker and Ted Cruz. "Instead of trying to turn back the clock, they should be joining us in saying loudly and clearly, 'No, no' to discrimination once and for all."

"I'm asking them, please: don't make the rights, the hopes, of any American, a political football for this 2016 campaign," Clinton continued.

She went on to to contrast Democratic policies on health care, women's health and gun control laws with those of Republicans. Pointing to a vote in Congress over Centers for Disease Control and research on gun violence, Clinton denounced Republicans for voting against the funding before the funerals of those shot and killed in Charleston last week were over. "How can you watch massacre after massacre and take that vote?" she said. "That is wrong."

She said the country doesn't need leaders who "shame and blame women" for medical decisions, calling out Republicans for restrictive policies on abortion and other women's health issues.

"Ask them about women's reproductive health, they're likely to talk—about defunding Planned Parenthood," she said. "Or maybe they'll insist on forcing women to undergo some demeaning and invasive medical procedure, as was attempted right here here in Virginia."

On health care, Clinton indicated that the Affordable Care Act isn't going anywhere after the Court's King v. Burwell decision, and Republicans would do well to fall in line. "All the Republicans candidates were furious that earlier this week, the Supreme Court once again confirmed what we've all known and believed for years—it is settled law and it is here to stay."

Clinton also showed how easily Republican candidate Donald Trump, who referred to Mexican immigrants as "rapists" and "criminals" during his campaign announcement, can be turned into a talking point for her campaign. "Maybe he's never met them," she said. "Maybe he's never stopped to ask the millions of people who love this country, work hard and want nothing more than a chance to build a better life for themselves and their children, what their lives are like."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Her speech came after a week particularly emboldening week Democrats, which began with widespread removals of the Confederate flag. That glee was apparent in speeches from the Virginia politicians who also appeared on stage.

"What an incredible week," said Warner. "I mean, is there a week in modern American history where so many fundamental things have changed?"

Virginia Sen. Tim Kaine said the week's victories made the country "a more perfect Union"—and said that if Clinton is elected, "we will make it more perfect again."

And Gov. Terry McAuliffe, a longtime friend and ally of the Clintons, joined in as he introduced her on stage: "Yes, after 226 years, it is time for a woman president of the United States!"

The latest mystery over Hillary's missing e-mails

Now this was predictable: The State Department on Thursday said Hillary Clinton failed to turn over 15 work-related e-mails from her private server, despite claiming she'd handed over everything.

Which raises the troubling question: How many more did she also, uh, "miss"?

Remember, the former secretary of state and her aides had insisted they'd sent the department all her work-related e-mails from her personal server after conducting a "careful" review.

Now it turns out she didn't include 15 of those she'd exchanged with longtime confidant Sidney Blumenthal concerning Libya.

To comply with a subpoena, Blumenthal gave the House Select Committee on Benghazi about 60 Libya-related e-mails he'd exchanged with Hillary. But the committee found some of those were not included in the batch the State Department gave it.

Now we know the reason: State didn't actually get everything from Hillary.

Of course, Hillary & Co. are always ready with an answer: Her staff claims it doesn't "recognize many of those materials and cannot speak to their origin."

Hmm. Maybe George W. Bush secretly wrote them and planted them on Blumenthal's hard drive.

Sure, it's possible those messages were missed accidentally in Hillary's search. The State Department also claims the content of the omitted Blumenthal e-mails "is not relevant to the 2012 attacks in Benghazi" — a key part of the committee's probe.

But even if you give Hillary the undeserved benefit of the doubt, the revelation is still troubling.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"This has implications far beyond Libya, Benghazi and our committee's work," says panel chairman Trey Gowdy. "This conclusively shows her e-mail arrangement with herself, which was then vetted by her own lawyers, has resulted in an incomplete public record."

Indeed.

The point is, if she missed Blumenthal's e-mails, she might have also overlooked others — "accidentally" or not. In fact, the only reason anyone even found out about Blumenthal's stash is because hackers got them and made them public.

Bottom line: Hillary failed to supply a complete record, despite her assertions to the contrary. Once again the public may never know what it's missing.

And she wants Americans to trust her as their president?

Undo Obamacare? Dream on // New York Daily News // James Warren - June 28, 2015

Having ducked the need to replace Obamacare, Republicans can now bitch and flail and face Washington's most potent force: the status quo.

The Affordable Care Act is now the de facto status quo as a result of the Supreme Court's decision last week. And smart Republicans should know you usually get only one shot at the king.

They tried by concocting a theory that was less about substance than semantics: What did an exchange "established by the state" really mean?

Now they can rail against Obamacare and "activist" judges. GOP presidential candidates can make that a campaign refrain and thus let the party keep the issue without owning the outcome of the decision they sought, namely more than 6 million losing their health care.

But do they really have a chance to change, even repeal, the law?

"It's hard to fully repeal it, but it is not that hard to change it substantially. The GOP has to have a strategy of fixing it, the more the better," says John Feehery, a Republican consultant and former top aide to former House Speaker Dennis Hastert and House Minority Leader Tom DeLay.

Changing it substantially will be hard for a simple reason: the history of entitlements screams out that the longer a law is in place, the harder it is to ditch or dramatically alter it.

Indeed, there's a lot of research about what the political scientists call "positive feedback loops" when it comes to policy.

The academics can make it sound complex but it isn't: You pass a law, constituencies who rely on it are born and they and others proceed to resist changes.

"Social Security is the classic case, of course," says Andrew Rudalevige, a political scientist at Bowdoin College.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There are a few examples to the contrary. For example, interest groups fought ferociously to regain their tax breaks and undermined a historic bipartisan tax reform in 1986 crafted under President George H.W. Bush.

But Social Security and other transformational changes, such as transportation deregulation (trucking and airlines), proceeded apace and suggest why Obamacare "has staying power," as Rudalevige puts it.

It's unleashed market forces that are hard to undo.

If you doubted that, be informed that HCA Holdings Inc., Tenet Healthcare Corp. and Community Health Systems Inc. shares all gained at least 8% shortly after Bloomberg News first broke word of the decision at 10:08:09 a.m. Eastern Standard Time on Thursday (beating Thomson Reuters by all of six seconds).

Further, Obamacare is pretty heavy on regulations, like Social Security and Medicare. Those become tough to alter, while creating a huge number of people with incentives to maintain their benefits.

It's not guaranteed with metaphysical certitude but likely. One interesting qualifier is broached in the work of Andrea Campbell at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, who talks about welfare politics and its key constituents, the poor, voting infrequently and finding it harder to organize.

So one trick for Obamacare might be to make sure it insinuates itself into the middle class, which has more political clout and ability to resist change.

But it's not as if even proponents don't concede issues with the law, which did not alter the private health care system in any significant fashion.

"Basically the real challenge now is for delivery system reform — that is improving quality and lowering cost," said Ezekiel Emanuel, an oncologist and medical ethics and health policy expert at the University of Pennsylvania and a former White House adviser on the health care law.

"The ACA galvanized that activity and is pushing it forward but a lot more needs doing. That will continue now without distraction of will ACA be repealed. That is good.

"And one would hope that there could be more bipartisan overlap to push initiatives that would accelerate the transformation. It is happening but could go faster."

For sure. But, with a presidential campaign upon us, the near certainty is that even as more Americans may benefit from the law, Republicans will beat the drum.

And they'll go after Hillary Clinton for her support, while she beats her own drum among minorities, especially Latinos, and gains advantage.

The bottom line will be the same: The GOP can hector all it wants. But, as with gay marriage, they've now lost the argument.

June 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton did last week what candidates for president often do in Minnesota. She quietly swooped into town, steered toward Lake Minnetonka and switched on her campaign-finance vacuum cleaner. It went to work on a crowd of about 120 that reportedly nibbled crab salad and vegetable-chèvre crêpes while Clinton discussed the challenges facing America's working families.

You missed the big rally that followed? So did I — because there wasn't one.

I'm not complaining (much). It's early. As the far-and-away front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination, Clinton likely has all next summer and September and October, too, to rent a local arena and put on a show that in many Minnesota minds has become obligatory. The DFL faithful who have worked to keep Minnesota reliably Democratic blue in every presidential election save one since 1960 expect at least one such performance.

Or next year, maybe more than one — given the year's unusual state political lineup.

Ever-turning four- and six-year election cycles have spun around to a circumstance not seen in Minnesota since 1992, the first time the name Clinton was on the presidential ballot. It's a presidential year in which no state constitutional office is at stake. Neither U.S. Senate seat is up for grabs. The state's eight U.S. House seats will be on the ballot, as usual. So will all 201 seats of the Minnesota Legislature.

President, the U.S. House, and the Minnesota House and Senate. Toss in a few county races and a ballot question or two, and that's the entire political dance card in 2016. (If your memory does not stretch back to 1992, try this variation: It's 2004 plus the state Senate to boot.)

That means legislative candidates next year will be more vulnerable than usual to the vagaries of presidential politics. The situation has DFL legislators investing a lot of hope in Hillary — and last week, it had the Minnesota Republican Party behaving as the anti-Welcome Wagon as Clinton pulled into town.

The state GOP's news conference pulled no punches. It called Clinton "shady," "dishonest and untrustworthy," and prone to "secrecy and scandal."

Only minutes later, the business-funded Minnesota Jobs Coalition piled on. It released a poll of 600 likely voters conducted June 9-11 in 16 Minnesota House districts that have proved prone to swing to either party in recent years — 12 in Greater Minnesota, four in the suburbs.

The approve/disapprove results weren't pretty for Clinton: 35 percent approve, 49 percent disapprove, the coalition crowed. Coalition executive director John Rouleau noted that even among female poll respondents — voters who typically tilt toward the DFL — Hillary's approval score lagged 6 percentage points behind her disapproval share.

Those numbers shouldn't cause any panic attacks among DFLers — yet. The poll did not pair Clinton with any GOP rival. And — did I mention? — it's early.

But the poll's very design underscores this feature of 2016 Minnesota politics: Control of the Legislature will be the year's big prize. It likely won't turn on which presidential candidate carries this state. But it may well turn on how the presidential contenders perform in a few dozen key districts in Greater Minnesota and on the metro fringe.

And as the last several legislative elections showed, a big factor in political performance is turnout. When it's low — 1998, 2010, 2014 — Republicans generally pick up legislative seats. When it's 70-plus percent — Minnesota's usual presidential-year range — DFLers do better.

The question that's got to be nagging at DFLers is whether a Hillary Clinton presidential candidacy can gin up Minnesota's customary turnout — and whether that turnout will be substantial not only in Linden Hills and Highland Park, but also Willmar, Brainerd and Albert Lea.

Clinton's money-vacuum stop at Ellen Goldberg Luger's back yard last week provided little indication that she's attuned to this local concern. Other aspects of her campaign do.

Within days of announcing her candidacy on April 12, Clinton dispatched a full-time organizer to every state in the country, assigned to work with local Democratic parties and pols to enlist reliable volunteers. That's an earlier and bigger commitment to grass-roots organizing in states without early primaries than presidential candidates typically make.

Clinton's man on the ground in Minnesota, Scott Hogan, deflected my queries about his activity to the campaign's Brooklyn, N.Y., headquarters. There, an official said that Hogan's been plenty busy, arranging 24 events and signing up more than 575 volunteers in less than two months. Notably, those events have occurred in each of the eight congressional districts, not just the DFL strongholds of Minneapolis, St. Paul and Duluth.

That geographic reach undoubtedly pleases the DFL legislative campaign crew. So does her professed interest in coordinating her campaign with the DFL Party and legislative races, rather than operating as a free agent.

So do the candidate's published assurances that she aims not just to win her own election, but to bolster state and local political parties and shore up democracy along the way. One such, from South Carolina: "I am running to live again at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. But I don't want to be there all by myself. I want Democrats elected from the local to the county to the state to the federal level, once again making the case that when Democrats win, Americans win."

More than the current occupant of 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, Clinton is a creature of the Democratic Party. She looks likely to be a team player who will visibly ally herself with local candidates, show up a time or two and spend some campaign cash in a traditionally blue state. That undoubtedly sounds good to DFLers trying to hang on to the state Senate and recapture the House.

But as the Jobs Coalition's poll suggests, Clinton's reputation as an establishment Democrat may limit her appeal in legislative swing districts. In those places, her efforts to be a DFL party-builder could be a two-edged sword.

Hillary's list offers staffers cheap Brooklyn accommodation // Telegraph // Rob Crilly – June 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton's decision to locate her campaign HQ in fashionable Brooklyn has given staffers and volunteers a major headache - how to find affordable accommodation in one of the country's most inflated housing markets.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The campaign is running a spare room or couch surfing service - a sort of politicos' Craig's List - pairing donors with its young army of workers who need a bed for the night.

The scheme is part necessity, part useful branding exercise for a wealthy politician frequently derided as out of touch with ordinary Americans and their money worries.

One recent email put it bluntly.

“Do you have a spare room – or just a spare couch! – where a new staffer could stay?”

“You and I both know that finding a place to live in New York can take longer than an afternoon of apartment hunting,” it said.

“These folks will be working long days, so they really just need a place to sleep, and they'll be so grateful to be staying with someone who shares their beliefs and their goals.”

Mrs Clinton's run for the White House is based over two floors of an office block in Brooklyn Heights.

In fact Brooklyn Heights lacks the hipster appeal of places such as Williamsburg, but even so its historic brownstowns and views across the East River to Manhattan, mean that rents are the highest in the entire borough. Finding a shoe-box sized apartment for less than $2000 (£1270) is a challenge.

Lena Dunham, writer and star of Girls, recently spent almost $5 million on a home just around the corner.

For those on a more modest budget, it means hunting further afield – scouting locations deeper into Brooklyn, in the sort of neighbourhoods that have yet to get an artisan coffee shop - or apartment hopping using the Clinton Campaign's host-a-staffer service.

Jasmin Harris, 22, stayed with a middle aged couple in their Brooklyn Heights apartment, for six weeks, until they needed their spare room for visiting relatives.

“I don’t know exactly where I’m going, but I’ll be somewhere else tonight,” she told The New York Times. “I have my bags packed and am waiting for an email.”

It is not the only money-saving element of the campaign.

Workers have been told to take the bus wherever possible. That is in part to keep costs down during the primary campaign when individual donations are limited to $2700 per person, but also to show that lessons have been learnt from the disastrous 2008 run when Mrs Clinton was seen as the high-spending Washington insider upended by Barack Obama's shoestring insurgents.

Although it still leaves Mrs Clinton with one other dilemma headache – whether to take the usual summer break in the Hamptons where a holiday home can cost $200,000 a month.

Clinton Ally Terry McAuliffe Suggests Hillary's Leadership Is 'Fitting' Of Charleston Victims // IJReview // Katie Lapotin – June 27, 2015

Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe told a crowd full of supporters Friday night that the type of leadership former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton would bring to the White House is "fitting of the people who lost their lives last week" during a mass shooting at a historically black church in Charleston, S.C.

The former DNC chair was introducing the 2016 presidential candidate at the state party's annual Jefferson-Jackson Dinner when he made the remark.

> "In the wake of that unspeakable tragedy in Charleston, South Carolina, many politicians went out of their way to duck the tough issues that terrible act raised. But not Hillary Clinton. Hillary stepped forward and began a national conversation about race and gun violence," he said.
> "It is fitting of the people who lost their lives last week. Folks, this is the type of leadership that we need from our next president."

McAuliffe, who also served as chairman of her failed 2008 presidential bid, quipped that he would rather share a cold one with Hillary than her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

Clinton returned the gesture from her longtime friend and political ally, telling those in attendance:

> "[McAuliffe's] my kind of leader, a pragmatic progressive. He prefers common ground to scorched earth."

Clinton's speech at the Jefferson-Jackson Friday was her first official campaign visit to Virginia since launching her campaign in April. Despite the state's importance in 2016, however, party organizers ended up giving away free tickets to the dinner late Friday in order to fill tables.

Hillary Clinton establishes campaign presence in ND // Dickinson Press // Grace Lyden and Tu-Uyen Tran – June 27, 2015

For three weeks, Clinton has had a staffer in town, Andrew Buis, who also worked for President Barack Obama's campaign. But fitting with the name of her "Ramp Up Grassroots Organizing Program," most of the events, such as house parties and barbecues, have been hosted by local volunteers.

"We want people to get involved, not just people who are deeply entrenched in politics, but everyone," said Jeffrey Eide, a 30-year-old volunteer who lives in Fargo.

It's an approach Clinton is taking nationwide. Campaign spokesman Tyrone Gayle said in an email that paid staffers like Buis are in all 50 states and the territories through the end of June, but that Clinton's message will be spread through "old-school organizing," complete with potlucks and parades.

Eide, who's joined Buis in talking to people on the street, said this attracts and gives voice to atypical voters, particularly millennials. Obama appealed to that age group with his savvy social media, and Clinton aims to get their vote with old-fashioned conversation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Amongst my friends, I sense oftentimes that people feel their concerns and their political interests are not being attended to," Eide said. "As important as social media is for getting out and maintaining and reinforcing a strong message, face-to-face communication, in my opinion, has always been the best way to get to know other people and hear what they have to say."

Gayle said there have been grass-roots organizing meetings in Fargo, Grand Forks, Bismarck and Belcourt.

Volunteer Mary Jo Cayley, who is housing Buis, said gatherings also create momentum and, in turn, motivate people to vote. They build enthusiasm, she said, and make for a more positive campaign.

"Last time, it was, 'Yes we can,' " she said. "Now, we know we can."

But how likely is a Clinton win in North Dakota?

Carma Hanson, vice chairwoman of the North Dakota Republican Party, sees Clinton's early start as a sign that she knows what she's up against.

"She's going to be looking for votes wherever she can get them, and I think she knows we are a very Republican state," Hanson said. "It will be a battle for Democrats in the state to establish their presence, so I think it's their way of reaching out and trying to grab that foothold in a state that is very red."

No Republican presidential candidate has established a presence in North Dakota yet.

"Members of the Republican Party have received materials in the mail and that kind of thing, but as far as opening office doors and things like that, I'm not aware of any at this time," Hanson said. She said one would probably do so next spring or summer, once a front-runner appears.

But Cayley believes Clinton has the potential to appeal to North Dakotans.

"She's dedicated her life to public service. That's hard work," Cayley said. "We have those values of working hard, and I think all North Dakotans can stand behind that."

Robert Haider, executive director of the North Dakota Democratic-NPL Party, said he couldn't comment on whether other Democratic candidates were planning North Dakota campaigns.

Buis declined an interview.

Dynasties aren't all bad news // Las Vegas Sun // Jamelle Bouie - June 28, 2015

Hillary Clinton is the front-runner in the Democratic presidential primary, and Jeb Bush is a front-runner in the Republican one. And although there is a lifetime of politics between now and the next election, there's a good chance that, on Nov. 8, 2016, Americans will choose between a Bush and a Clinton for the second time in 25 years. We could have our third Bush presidency or another turn for the Clintons.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To many Americans, this is troubling. Last year, former first lady Barbara Bush said that "there are more than two or three families that should run for high office in America." Sixty-nine percent of Americans agree, according to a 2014 poll from NBC News and the Wall Street Journal.

In March, in another NBC News/WSJ survey, 39 percent of voters said they would think more or somewhat more favorably of a candidate whose last name was not Bush or Clinton. Similarly, a majority said that electing Hillary Clinton or Jeb Bush would represent a return to the policies of the past.

There's no denying that the status quo — of a White House claimed by one or the other family — is unusual, and I won't criticize anyone disturbed by a pattern of "Bush, Clinton, Bush, Obama, Bush" or "Bush, Clinton, Bush, Obama, Clinton."

But I also don't think it's as bad as it looks.

Observers have called this a "dynastic" election. This headline from a January edition of The New York Times is typical: "Are two dynasties our destiny?"

"Dynasty" might apply to the Bush family. Indeed, Jeb Bush, in his announcement speech, described himself as "a guy who met his first president on the day he was born and his second on the day he was brought home from the hospital," before declaring that "not a one of us (presidential candidates) deserves the job by right of resume, party, seniority, family or family narrative. It's nobody's turn."

But that term doesn't apply to the Clintons. Hillary Clinton neither came from a political family nor joined one. Instead, she entered politics as a partner to Bill and, after two decades as a political spouse, set out on her own career, first as a senator, then as a presidential candidate, then as a top diplomat, and now — again — as a presidential candidate.

Given the degree to which she's built her career in tandem with her husband's, Clinton isn't a dynastic candidate as much as she's a tightly connected one.

For some, of course, this is a distinction without a difference, which is why it's important to note that national political dynasties are a recurring part of American life.

The first father-son presidential duo, in the 19th century, was John Adams and his son, John Quincy Adams, the second and sixth presidents of the United States. The Harrison family also produced two presidents, William Henry and Benjamin. The Breckinridges dominated Kentucky politics and sent senators, House members and a vice president to Washington. Two other antebellum presidents — John Tyler and Franklin Pierce — came from distinctly political families.

The 20th century brings more familiar names: Theodore Roosevelt and his cousin Franklin Roosevelt; William Howard Taft, his son Sen. Robert A. Taft, his grandson Sen. Robert Taft Jr., and his great-grandson, former Ohio Gov. Robert Taft III. Most famously, there's the Kennedy clan.

The fact that dynasties are normal — that Senate seats, governorships and presidencies have moved between and within families with ease — may be alarming (America isn't especially meritocratic), but it's also mostly harmless.

American democracy wasn't stronger after two Adams presidencies in quick succession, but it wasn't weaker, either. Besides, despite the frequency of dynasties, the vast majority of powerful positions in national politics go to people who aren't connected to political families.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One last point. George W. Bush was a very different president than his father, and if elected, Hillary Clinton will be a different president than her husband. Hillary faces a different Democratic Party than Bill did and has to make different choices for different ends. The same is true for Jeb and the Republican Party. Their surnames aside, neither is "more of the same."

When you vote for president, you're voting for an administration of bureaucrats and assistants and a whole host of appointees. What matters most is the party and its network of operatives, activists and policymakers, not the individual at the head of that party.

If Clinton had won in 2008, her administration would have looked a lot like the one Obama put together. And on the same score, a Jeb Bush White House probably wouldn't look too different than a Scott Walker White House or a Marco Rubio White House.

The aesthetics of another Clinton or Bush presidency don't look great. But optics have little bearing on what either candidate would do in office.

Immigrant issues a priority for Clinton // Las Vegas Sun // Rafael Lopez – June 27, 2015

I grew up like any other American child, but I didn't have the same opportunities. Why? I'm undocumented. I've lived in Nevada since I was a baby, but my family got caught in our broken immigration system. We fell victim to fraud: An attorney falsely promised to fix our statuses. Instead, we received deportation orders.

But there is hope. Three years ago I woke to a phone call that changed my life: My friend told me President Barack Obama had announced a deferred action (DACA) program to help Dreamers. Through DACA, I obtained a work permit, and my life instantly improved. I was able to afford tuition at UNLV and I no longer lived in fear. Now, I'm in my last semester pursing a degree in psychology and criminal justice.

But we still have much to do. Our next president must step up and defend our families.

This May, I participated in a roundtable with Hillary Clinton to talk about just that. Clinton strongly supported immigration reform. She answered our questions with clarity, showed she understood our challenges and listened with compassion. She defended DACA and pledged to strengthen protections for undocumented immigrants.

It's too early to tell which presidential candidates offer the best solutions, but last week at the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials conference in Las Vegas, Clinton again demonstrated she will fight to keep families together.

I want to hear more from Clinton and other candidates about immigration reform. I only hope others will talk to me with the same respect as Hillary did.

O'MALLEY

O'Malley: Islamic State a result of 'mindless rush to war' // AP // Ken Thomas – June 27, 2015

WASHINGTON — Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley said Friday the rise of the Islamic State group was an unintended consequence of a "mindless rush to war" in Iraq and the U.S. must avoid "mission creep" there now.

In a speech, the former Maryland governor said the invasion of Iraq was one of the most tragic and costly blunders in U.S. history. He made no mention of his Democratic rival, Hillary Rodham Clinton, who faced criticism during her 2008 presidential campaign for her Senate vote in favor of the 2003 invasion, which she has since called a mistake.

"No threat probably better illustrates the unintended consequences of a mindless rush to war — and a lack of understanding — than the emergence of ISIS," O'Malley said in his first foreign policy address as a presidential candidate, using an acronym for the Islamic State group.

He added: "We are still paying the price of a war pursued under false pretenses and acquiesced to, in the words of Dr. (Martin Luther) King (Jr.) by 'the appalling silence of the good.' "

Speaking to the Truman National Security Project, O'Malley said there is a risk that American military involvement in Iraq could be counter-productive. He said the U.S. should work with partners to "contain, degrade and ultimately wear down and defeat ISIS."

O'Malley said American foreign and national security policies are directly connected to economic stability around the globe and a rising global middle class. He said the U.S. faces an array of threats, from violent extremism and nuclear proliferation, to pandemics and cyberattacks. He advocated tackling climate change, promoting fair trade and addressing poverty around the world.

The ex-governor trails Clinton and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders in the early stages of the Democratic primary campaign and could be at a disadvantage on foreign policy against Clinton, who traveled the globe as President Barack Obama's secretary of state.

Ahead of next week's deadline on Iran talks, O'Malley said a nuclear-armed Iran is among the most immediate threats faced by the U.S. He said Congress would be wise to support a "verifiable, enforceable agreement" that bars Iran's path to developing nuclear weapons.

O'Malley also said there are "real lessons" to be learned from the 2012 attack on the U.S. diplomatic facility in Benghazi, Libya, that killed four Americans, including U.S. ambassador Chris Stevens. A GOP-led House panel has been investigating the attack and Clinton's actions.

O'Malley said the Benghazi attack shows the need to "know in advance who is likely to take power — or vie for it — once a dictator is toppled, not after."

Doug Wilson, O'Malley's foreign policy adviser, said the speech was not "about Hillary Clinton and the State Department," but about how O'Malley would conduct foreign policy if elected president.

How pardons from O'Malley changed one man's course // Delmarva Now // Jennifer Cording and Phil Davis – June 27, 2015

It was mid-July, and it was hot, but maybe that wasn't the only reason Darnell Bowen's palms were damp. Most people in his shoes would be a bit nervous.

He'd just seen the governor arrive — along with his big opportunity — at the Crisfield clam bake.

So the Berlin native walked right up to then-Gov. Martin O'Malley and he stuck out his hand. The men shook and exchanged how-are-you's.

Most folks were ready for a party and seafood that day, of course. But Bowen was there for a very different reason.

He wanted to clear his name. He wanted a second chance for a better job and a better life.

Bowen shook hands with the governor, and he asked O'Malley for a criminal pardon.

And O'Malley blessed it — right there amongst the picnic tables of corn and crab shells and seafood lovers — and with that unofficial approval, Bowen had a fresh start in life.

Or, at least, the process of a gubernatorial pardon began.

For Bowen, convicted years earlier for a minor theft, it was like the clouds lifted and the sun was shining for the first time in years at the crowded clam bake that day.

"I guess I felt happy because it was coming directly from him, and I was hoping he was telling me the truth," said Bowen.

"It's a weight off my shoulders"

Bowen, seated recently at his own picnic table in the freshly mowed yard of his family's home in Berlin, told how much the pardon meant to him.

The misdemeanor conviction — he'd stolen a $5 canister of camera film — showed up on a job background check, he said.

He'd lost a managerial job at Eastern Correctional Institution because the conviction showed up during a background check, he said.

"They gave me the job and everything," he said. "They gave me a start date."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the conviction was enough to derail all of it.

Bowen's was one of about 150 pardons O'Malley approved during his just-completed eight-year tenure as Maryland's governor.

The former Baltimore mayor — who marketed himself as "tough on crime" — recently announced a bid for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination.

And it's true he didn't hand out many pardons compared to the requests that came across his desk, nor compared to those granted by other governors in recent years.

When he finally heard from the pardons office that his record was wiped clean, Bowen took to Facebook, he said, to celebrate the news.

When the piece of paper came in the mail, he had to register it at the local courthouse. Court workers passed around the pardon, Bowen said. They'd never seen one.

And it's true it took persistence to get it. The application process took two years — even after the governor gave Bowen the nod at the festival.

"I wasn't going to give up," said Bowen. "It's a weight off my shoulders."

Pardons as a reflection of the politician

Voters like politicians who are tough on crime, it seems.

And, it seems politicians like to accommodate. O'Malley rejected nearly 1,300 pardon cases during his term.

The vast majority of his pardons covered minor crimes, such as misdemeanor thefts and lesser drug charges. Outside of the commutations of four death-row inmates — and a medical commutation of a convicted armed robber who contracted AIDS — records show most people granted pardons served no jail time and had short probationary periods.

Some other governors have been tough, too. In Kansas, former Democratic Gov. Kathleen Sebelius issued only one pardon during her six years in office between 2003 and 2009. Her successor, current Gov. Sam Brownback, a Republican, once declared he would refuse to issue pardons for an entire year in 2011.

However, in California, Gov. Jerry Brown issued 105 pardons on Christmas Eve 2014 alone. Illinois Gov. Pat Quinn, a Democrat, granted clemency more than 1,000 times in four years.

On a national level, Bowen's story highlights a delicate question employers, both public and private, must weigh: How does someone's criminal past affect his or her future?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

According to a study done by the National Employment Law Project, an estimated 70 million people in the United States have arrest or conviction records.

Since "tough on crime" political platform swept the country in the 1980s and 1990s, incarceration rates inflated from 150 people per 100,000 citizens in 1980 to as high as 753 people per 100,000 citizens in 2008.

"This is a huge problem all over this country," said Nayantara Mehta, a senior staff attorney with the organization.

Citing the study, Mehta's organization and others have pushed for larger reforms for "fair chance" employment.

According to Eastern Correctional Institution spokesman Gerard Shields, if an applicant is disqualified if their misdemeanor crime carries a potential penalty of a year or more in prison.

While Bowen's crime would not carry a penalty that large now, it did in 1997, when "theft under $300" could mean up to 18 months in jail in Maryland.

"His story is really very, very similar with what most people experience," said Victor Dickson, president of Safer Foundation.

The foundation, based out of Chicago, helps ex-offenders find work and supports the National Law Enforcement Project's advocacy for "fair chance" employment.

For Dickson, Bowen's story is one he's heard before.

"We had another lady who ... had some drug charges, went to school and actually wanted to get into the health care field," Dickson said. "She started working for a hospital and was on the job — I think for two or three months — and then the company did a background check, saw the drug charges and then terminated her."

"That record is used to deny people a whole host of things that we consider to be the basic right of a citizen," Dickson added, pointing to ranging restrictions on public housing, voting and public benefits in various states.

A life-changing encounter

Bowen, now 50, served his probationary period and was not convicted of further crimes.

He bounced around the job market, but he also worked for a decade at a local Salisbury upholstery business before it relocated farther south, according to Bowen.

With his experience, he decided to apply for a management position supervising prisoners in the upholstery work program at Eastern Correctional Institution.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He was surprised to see how well the interview process went, at first.

"They gave me the job and everything," Bowen said. "They gave me a start date."

But then he was sent to Baltimore for a background check, and he was told he'd lost the job. He said he received no explanation. Bowen didn't think the misdemeanor theft charge was relevant to working in upholstery.

"No, I don't think it was justified," Bowen said. He applied for a pardon once, he said, and he was turned down. Someone in the pardons office told him most people are turned down the first time, Bowen said.

Bowen said it set the stage for his experience at the J. Millard Tawes Clam and Crab Bake.

For more than three decades the event has been perhaps the most distinctly political gathering on the Eastern Shore. The shells of eaten crabs, corn and other Shore seafood delicacies — toted from the food stands in cardboard box plates — are strewn across vast picnic tables.

But past the picnic tables are the tents of legislative hopefuls and dignitaries. State delegate and senate campaign slogans are emblazoned on signs and baking on the backs of campaign managers in the hot July sun.

Bowen saw the governor. That day in 2012 was especially hot, he remembers.

"So I said 'OK, here's my chance.' So I went and shook his hand and (asked), 'Could I have a few minutes of your time?'" Bowen said. "I just threw my situation out to them."

Though he'd been denied previously, he hoped his story would strike a chord with the Democratic governor. It did, and O'Malley told Bowen to reapply for the pardon and to pass along O'Malley's verbal stamp of approval.

It took more than a year, still, but Bowen did receive a pardon from O'Malley in 2013, records show. It was 16 years after the film theft.

He knows the job at ECI is gone, but Bowen said he still thinks about it and how it'd be different now.

"But, every now and then, a thought comes back that if it would become available again, I (maybe) would apply," said Bowen, who works now as a field engineer for the Oracle Corp., a multinational computer technology company.

But, even if the upholstery management job doesn't come up again, Bowen says he's glad he'll never again need to worry about his former criminal conviction.

It took persistence and determination, but Bowen had plenty of both. He said it's how he finally cleared his name.

"I wasn't going to give up," he said.

SANDERS

Sanders says he will significantly step up his outreach to minority voters // WaPo // John Wagner – June 27, 2015

NASHUA, N.H. -- Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, who's made limited headway with African American voters despite drawing large crowds on the campaign trail, on Saturday pledged "a significant expansion" in outreach to minority communities.

"We're going to significantly increase that," the Democratic presidential hopeful told reporters after a morning campaign stop here. "The views that we hold are important to all Americans … but to be honest with you, they're probably more relevant to black and Hispanic voters … because the poverty rate in those communities is even higher than whites."

Sanders, a self-described democratic socialist, cited his support to raise the minimum wage to $15 an hour and offer free college tuition as examples.

In a later interview, Sanders said he plans to add members to his campaign staff to help with the effort.

"We're going to be bringing people into our campaign who will give us increased capability of reaching out to the African American community and the Hispanic community," he said. "We have a lot of work to do."

Black voters are a crucial constituency in the Democratic nominating process, particularly after the contest moves beyond Iowa and New Hampshire to South Carolina and other states with larger African American populations, where Hillary Rodham Clinton is a well-established figure.

In recent weeks, Sanders has seen his crowds swell in early nominating states and other places where he's traveled. His audiences numbered in the thousands recently in both Minneapolis and Denver.

Sanders represents a state that is 95 percent white. In a piece in the New York Times last week outlining his challenge, the senator's advisers acknowledged that he remains largely unknown among African American voters, despite a civil rights record that includes leading sit-ins in the 1960s.

Speaking here to a crowd of more than 500 packed into a community college gymnasium, Sanders made a passing reference to having more recently joined African American workers in North Carolina on the picket lines in support of raising the minimum wage.

During his hour-long stump speech, however, he made no mention of the recent massacre at a historic African American church in Charleston, S.C., that left nine parishoners dead. The episode has prompted Clinton and another Democratic, former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley (D), to make gun control a prominent part of their pitch.

Sanders, whose state is rural and home to many hunters, has a mixed record on gun control, including a 1993 vote against the landmark Brady Bill, which mandated federal background checks on firearms purchasers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Asked by an audience member here Saturday if he is willing to take on the National Rifle Association, Sanders defended his record, saying the gun rights group has given him a lifetime rating of “somewhere between D and F.”

Sanders noted the rural nature of his state, saying that “guns in Chicago and Los Angeles are not the same thing as guns in New Hampshire and Vermont.”

But he relayed that he has during his career voted for bills to ban assault weapons and high-capacity ammunition clips.

“I think my record is pretty strong,” he said.

A Democratic senator attacked Bernie Sanders for being extreme. He should thank her. // WaPo //
Amber Phillips – June 27, 2015

Bernie Sanders is "extreme," and if the media were to dig into him a little more, he wouldn't be doing as well as he is.

That attack comes not from a Republican, but one of the Democratic senators with whom Sanders caucuses.

"The media is giving Bernie a pass right now,” Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) said Thursday on MSNBC. “I very rarely read in any coverage of Bernie that he’s a socialist.”

First of all: Wrong. It's hard to find an account of Sanders's personal politics that doesn't include the s-word. It's all over the place.

And the Vermont senator is indeed a socialist. He's an independent who caucuses with the Democrats in the Senate. He's also running for president as a Democrat, and several polls show him gaining a bit on frontrunner Hillary Clinton -- whom McCaskill supports -- while making headlines for drawing thousands of people to campaign events as far off as Denver.

McCaskill argued Sanders wouldn't be doing so well if the media treated him like other candidates. "I think everybody wants a fight," she continued.

That might be true. But in saying that, McCaskill has essentially set up one. Her comments ring of the kind of intra-party snipes you'd expect to see in a contested, genuinely competitive primary. Witness her start comparing Clinton to Sanders:

"I think Bernie Sanders has a message that's touching people," McCaskill said. "And I totally get that. But so does Hillary Clinton."

McCaskill said Sanders is "too liberal" to win, and she could be right.

As The Fix has pointed out several times, it's too soon to know whether Sanders's impressive support this early on will translate into votes that could actually give Clinton a run for her money. The other day, 92 percent of Democratic-leaning voters said they'd be comfortable with Clinton as the Democratic nominee. And she's still polling like a frontrunner; about 50 percent of Iowa Democrats told Bloomberg last week she's her first choice, while 24 percent said Sanders is.

Sanders told Bloomberg later that day this is the first time he thinks a Democratic colleague "has attacked me like this."

And he has better hope it isn't the last, because it's a sign that Clinton supporters are at least mildly concerned.

Sanders: I was ahead of the curve on gay rights // The Hill // Mark Hensch – June 27, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) said Saturday he has been waiting for the nation to catch up to his support for same-sex marriage.

Sanders' remarks come a day after Friday's landmark 5-4 Supreme Court ruling legalizing same-sex marriage nationwide.

He argued he was well ahead of the historic decision, unlike Hillary Clinton, his main rival for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination.

"Back in 1996, that was a tough vote," Sanders said of his opposition to the Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA).

"Not too many people voted against it, but I did," he told listeners in Nashua, N.H.

Sanders at the time served in the House of Representatives, which voted 342-67 in favor of DOMA. The Senate voted 85-14 in favor, before former President Bill Clinton signed it into law.

"That was an anti-gay marriage piece of legislation," he added of the law that defined marriage at the federal level as the coupling of one man and one woman.

Sanders on Saturday praised Americans for creating greater opportunities for same-sex couples. Friday's Supreme Court ruling, he charged, was not possible without national pressure for gay rights.

"No one here should think for one second this starts with the Supreme Court," Sanders said.

"It starts at the grassroots level in all 50 states," he said. "The American people want to end discrimination in all its forms."

"Because of the decency of the American people, because of the strength of the gay rights movement, we have changed consciousness in this country," Sanders added.

The Vermont lawmaker criticized conservatives who reject same-sex marriage on religious grounds.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We disagree with right-wing Republicans’ definition of family values,” Sanders said. “They think that family values are opposition to gay marriage and gay rights.”

The 2016 White House hopeful also took aim at Wall Street and wealthy special interests.

“The message we are sending to the billionaire class is that your greed has got to end,” Sanders said of his presidential campaign.

“You cannot take advantage of all the benefits of America without accepting all the responsibilities of America,” he said. “That, to me, is not democracy.”

Sanders said the rich and powerful had created an economic system with fundamental flaws in its treatment of everyday Americans.

“In America today, we have more income and wealth inequality than any other major industrialized country on Earth,” he said.

“Today, the top one tenth of 1 percent owns almost as much one wealth as the bottom 90 percent,” Sanders said.

“That type of economy is immoral, it is unsustainable and it is un-American,” Sanders added. “Together we have to change it.”

Sanders formally launched his presidential campaign May 26 in Burlington, Vt.

He has since portrayed himself as a champion of progressive ideas to the left of Clinton, the heavy favorite for the Democratic coronation next year.

Bernie Sanders, Rising in Polls, Gets Standing Room Only Crowds in New Hampshire // National Journal // S. V. Dáte – June 27, 2015

HENNIKER, N.H. – Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders brought his call for a "political revolution" back to the first-in-the-nation primary state Saturday, again drawing enthusiastic crowds who cheered his message of curbing the influence of corporate interests in politics.

Sanders praised this week's Supreme Court decisions on Obamacare and same-sex marriage, but said the battle to reduce income and wealth inequality would be far tougher. "It is a much more difficult thing to look the billionaire class in the eye and say: you cannot have it all," Sanders said during a speech and question-and-answer session at a town meeting here.

This weekend's New Hampshire appearances are Sanders' first since recent polls show him emerging as the leading challenger to front runner Hillary Clinton for the Democratic primary nomination. One poll released last week by WMUR and CNN found Sanders just 8 points behind Clinton in New Hampshire. (Although a second poll released the same day by Bloomberg and St. Anselm College showed Clinton with a 32-point lead.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Clinton campaign, however, has enjoyed a big head start laying the groundwork for its turnout efforts in the Democratic primary. It already has opened a handful of field offices in the state and has two dozen paid staff. The campaign spent Saturday morning in its first canvassing effort aimed at likely primary voters.

Sanders' New Hampshire team is only just coming together. Sanders' New Hampshire coordinator, Kurt Ehrenberg, was hired a month ago, and so far has hired an operations manager and two field organizers. A state headquarters office is set to open next week in Concord, with other offices planned for the coming weeks, he said.

Sanders has been elected as an independent over his two-decade congressional career, and describes his political philosophy as "democratic socialism," as is practiced in much of Western Europe. Even some Democrats argue that Sanders is unelectable to nationwide office in the United States because of that label.

He has nevertheless drawn large audiences across the country, including 5,000 at a recent appearance in Denver.

Seth Kallman, a retired contractor from Harrisville who attended the Henniker appearance, said he agrees the "socialist" label is likely harmful. "I admire that he steps forward and uses it anyway, because he is honest," Kallman said, calling that one of Sanders' best attributes. "You couldn't get Hillary to speak that frankly. He is speaking frankly."

Sanders saw an audience of 500 at a morning town meeting in Nashua, about 150 at a house party in Bow, and 350 at the Henniker town meeting Saturday evening. All three were standing room only, exceeding expected attendance.

Bernie Sanders' surge is partly fueled by veterans // Boston Globe // Annie Linskey – June 28, 2015

DES MOINES — Vermont's Bernie Sanders railed against the Vietnam War. He voted against invading Iraq — both times. He wants to cut the defense budget.

He might not be a friend to the military, but many veterans believe he's gone to war for them. And that's why they're out there cheering for a socialist as he launches a bid for the Democratic presidential nomination.

There's the former Marine who drove about six hours to hear Sanders speak in Des Moines. There's another former Marine, this one a registered Republican, going door-to-door to collect signatures so Sanders' name will appear on the ballot in Indiana. Entire Reddit threads are dedicated to how veterans can best pitch Sanders to other veterans.

"He is revered," said Paul Loebe, a 31-year-old who served in both Iraq and Afghanistan during eight years of active duty and spends three hours a day updating a Facebook page promoting Sanders to veterans. "He's very consistent with where he stands. He's the first politician that I've believed in my life."

Sanders battled over veterans issues as chairman of the Senate Veterans Affairs Committee from 2013 until early this year, giving him an easy pitch to a crucial voting bloc of veterans, particularly in South Carolina where veterans make up more than 11 percent of the voting-aged population. There's stiff competition for these voters, with front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton wooing them this month during a round table in Nevada.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even the leaders of veterans groups who praise Sanders acknowledge that the 73-year-old Democratic socialist isn't an obvious champion for the flag-waving set of former military officers and enlistees. When asked if the Veterans of Foreign Wars, which recognized Sanders with its Congressional Award in March, had ever bestowed the honor on a socialist before, the group's Washington executive director, Bob Wallace chuckled a bit.

"No. No. No," said Wallace, a man who won three Purple Heart medals during Vietnam. "What you have to do is put aside his other interests."

Enthusiasm for Bernie Sanders's populist message is evident with crowds swelling at events and supporters pushing the slogan "Feel the Bern," a play on the senator's first name. It's difficult to know, beyond anecdotal evidence, how much of this support comes from veterans.

Sanders has previously courted veterans as part of an electoral strategy, campaigning in 2006 for Senate with triple-amputee Max Cleland, the former Democratic senator from Georgia and Veterans Affairs administrator. Sanders has done little on the trail to seek out veterans for his 2016 bid.

But veterans interviewed for this story were well versed in Sanders's record, aware that, as Veterans Affairs chairman, he pushed to restore cost of living raises, expand education opportunities, and add new dental care benefits.

The effort came within a few votes of passing the Senate, but was blocked by Republicans concerned about the $24 billion price tag.

Veterans also credit Sanders for striking a deal with Republicans to pass a smaller — $16 billion — package aimed at erasing the lengthy wait times at veterans hospitals. Passing it earned Sanders top awards from the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the Military Officers Association of America.

For Louis Celli, at the American Legion, Sanders's progressive views make some sense in the context of advocating for veterans' programs. "Who better than a socialist to advocate for veterans' health care?" he asked.

Passing the fix showed something else about Sanders: He was willing to make a deal. It's a notion that runs counter to commonly expressed concern — even among some attendees at Sanders's rallies — that the senator's far left views prevent him from working with others.

Last summer, the bill fixing wait times at hospitals appeared to be heading for defeat. Faced with possibility that Congress would adjourn without enacting it, Sanders joined forces with John McCain, the Arizona Republican and GOP presidential nominee in 2008.

Sanders dropped his opposition to a provision that let veterans who live far from VA hospitals use private doctors. In exchange, he got an additional $5 billion to hire more staff and build more facilities, according to a member of Sanders's staff.

McCain said working with Sanders involved "very stimulating conversations, and the occasional four-letter word."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"He advocates vigorously for what he believes in, and so do I," McCain said. "I can't say it was the most enjoyable experience, but it was certainly one of the most interesting."

Veterans are a group long courted by politicians. In the early primary states, New Hampshire is home to 113,000 veterans, Iowa has 226,000, Nevada has 227,000 and South Carolina has 392,000 — according to US Census figures.

Clinton held a round table for veterans in Nevada on June 18. She unveiled a detailed plan that would make changes to the GI Bill meant to protect veterans from what her campaign called "deceptive practices" by for-profit colleges and universities who target veterans but fail to provide a quality education.

Clinton, as is her custom at campaign events, didn't take questions from the audience.

Sanders typically does.

After speech at Drake University, the Vermont senator asked for questions. Tyson Manker was right there in the front row. He stood up, identified himself as a former Marine who drove six hours for the event, and said: "Mr. Sanders, I look forward to the day I can call you Mr. President."

David M. Shribman: Democrats swoon for Sanders // Pittsburgh Post-Gazette // David M. Shribman – June 28, 2015

Here are the elements of a presidential candidacy bound to go nowhere: 1960s radical leftist. Lived on a kibbutz. Moved to Vermont in the tumult of 1968. Became a carpenter. Ran for governor twice and for Senate twice as a candidate for the socialist Liberty Union Party. Jewish — not an advantage in Iowa, New Hampshire or South Carolina. Would be 79 at the end of his first term. Bernie Sanders is not going to be president of the United States.

But that doesn't mean he can't be a big factor in the 2016 presidential race.

He polls about a third of the vote in New Hampshire, which, contrary to popular perception, is not very much like its neighbor, Vermont. (In northern New England folklore, adapted from Milton's "Paradise Lost," one state is full of the "parsimonious emmet," the other populated by those known as "newts.")

Mr. Sanders does less well in Iowa, though his iconoclasm suits the sort of committed liberals who participate in that state's February caucuses — plus the United Auto Workers members who surely noticed that Mr. Sanders was swift to oppose the Trans-Pacific Partnership while former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton took weeks to decide.

This is not an argument that the Sanders surge threatens Ms. Clinton as she glides toward the Democratic presidential nomination. It is, however, an argument that he affects Ms. Clinton as she seeks the nomination.

This is all the more apparent now that it is also apparent that Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, the most prominent progressive in Washington, is not going to run for the White House. All the unrequited passion for Ms. Warren has been transferred to Mr. Sanders, with stunning suddenness and seamlessness. Earlier this month, the Ready for Warren group endorsed Mr. Sanders, saying he was the candidate "who best embodies the values that Warren champions."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Now we confront the nature of the Clinton campaign. It is fueled by determination rather than passion. There's nothing romantic to it, aside from its historical significance as the vehicle for the first female presidency — a factor not to be underestimated in November but less powerful now. Her steady-as-you-go campaign is the political equivalent of the line from the English novelist George Meredith that, a generation ago, was emblazoned on thousands of trivets hanging on kitchen walls, tacked against the rice wallpaper: "Kissing don't last, cookery do."

Ms. Clinton, the candidate of the cookery, is running the campaign of the hot tuna casserole. Mr. Sanders, by contrast, is running the campaign of the moonlight smooch.

Yet the Clinton campaign must deal with the factors that make all those hearts flutter there by the shore of Lake Winnipesaukee or by the Raccoon River in New Hampshire, for Mr. Sanders, who by appearance — floppy white hair, rumpled suit — does not exactly possess the raw materials (or the raw energy) that customarily make the masses swoon. He's no Edward Rochester of "Jane Eyre," nor even Heathcliff of "Wuthering Heights."

But the danger for the Clintonistas is that by its very existence, the Sanders campaign reveals the character of the Clinton campaign.

While the Sanders campaign is supple, the Clinton campaign is clunky. The Sanders campaign is ruled by instinct, the Clinton campaign by calculation. The Sanders campaign is audacious, the Clinton campaign is cautious. The Sanders campaign is roses and chocolates and chilled Champagne and a hopelessly amorous stroll across pine needles through thick woods at dusk (we'll find our shoes later), while the Clinton campaign is geraniums and rice pudding and V8 juice and a station-wagon trip across Interstate 80 (we're wearing sensible shoes, double knotted).

The strong likelihood that the Clinton campaign will triumph is important but, at this stage of the race, almost irrelevant.

Because it is Mr. Sanders (like Ms. Warren before him) who has the whip hand. By not winning he may still prevail, in the way that Ms. Warren did on income disparity. Just as Ms. Clinton embraced the signature Warren message by characterizing her campaign as an effort on behalf of "everyday Americans," she also sought to embrace a principal Sanders message by saying, finally, that she opposed the Trans-Pacific Partnership, which she repeatedly supported while a member of the Obama administration.

The next issues to watch for the Warren/Sanders effect: Single-payer health insurance, student debt, Wall Street, fracking.

We know what Mr. Sanders believes and we know he will say almost anything. We're not quite sure what Ms. Clinton believes, but we know that she will fashion her remarks with craftswoman-like care. People probably want the latter in a president. They're drawn to the former in a primary campaign — which is why, in New Hampshire in 1984, Sen. Gary Hart of Colorado, whose very eyes transmitted a twinkle of romance, prevailed over former Vice President Walter Mondale, whose fundamental decency suggested he was a fuddy-duddy and whose native caution suggested he was rigidly conventional.

All of which brings us to the most natural Bernie Sanders analogue, the 1992 Republican struggle mounted against George H.W. Bush, who held the presidency, by Patrick J. Buchanan, who in New Hampshire held a pitchfork. Mr. Buchanan had more fun, was more unpredictable, had better lines ("All the knights and barons will be riding into the castle pulling up the drawbridge in a minute. All the peasants are coming with pitchforks.") Mr. Bush had better results, though he lost the general election to Mrs. Clinton's husband.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I pulled Bush to the right on social and cultural issues, and he stopped talking about the New World Order,” Mr. Buchanan said in a telephone conversation last week. “I like Bernie — especially his independence — and I think he can have the same effect on Hillary, moving her way to the left.”

Mr. Buchanan didn’t win a single primary or caucus in 1992, though he came within 16 percentage points in New Hampshire (and actually won the primary there four years later, edging Sen. Bob Dole by one percentage point.) But he had a blast, and he didn’t allow Mr. Bush to wobble toward the center.

Similarly, Mr. Sanders will very likely win no primaries next year either. But Ms. Clinton will feel his presence at every stop, in every state.

WEBB

Webb close to 2016 decision, insiders say Clinton camp helped delay launch // Fox News // John Roberts – June 27, 2015

CLINTON, Iowa – Jim Webb was supposed to declare he was running for president Friday night. At least that's what the prevailing belief was inside his campaign.

Webb was scheduled to be the keynote speaker at the Clinton County Democratic Hall Of Fame dinner in Clinton, Iowa. While the timing was bad (Friday night, where news goes to die), insiders said Webb thought it would be a good place to drop the hammer on a presidential run.

Enter the Clinton campaign, which Webb confidantes grumble has been sandbagging them at every turn. They convinced the Clinton County Democratic Party to add Minnesota Sen. Amy Klobuchar to the speakers roster. The intention was for her to give a spirited sales pitch for Hillary at the very same place and time Webb would launch his campaign.

For Webb, insiders say, that, plus the fact that a Friday night launch could have gotten lost in the news cycle, was enough to convince him to delay the announcement.

Until when, only Webb knows.

Fox News caught up with Webb before the dinner, after a three-hour drive from Chicago which he described as "long." He wasn't giving up anything on the Clinton campaign stealing his thunder. To do so would be to admit there was thunder in the first place, which candidates are loath to do until the words "I'm running for president" actually come out of their mouth. But he did allow that he is getting close to pulling the trigger.

"We're pretty close to being done ... that's the best thing I can say, really," Webb said.

It was typical understatement from a guy who plays his cards so close to the vest that even his closest advisers are left to do a lot of tea-leaf reading. But Webb himself has said he would make a decision sometime around the end of June, so "close to being done" could be read as "imminent."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And it became clear Friday night that Webb's campaign will be one of 'themes' and not specific policy proposals. Go to the "issues" section of his website and one can find his positions on the complex problems facing the nation summed up in a single paragraph.

Ask him about specifics on, for example, what he would do to grow the economy and he begins to bristle.

"I don't think that the issue right now for me is to bring in some sort of a specific set of numbers that I would pull out of the air," Webb told Fox News. "The issue is to lay down the themes that we would govern on and then to bring good people in."

That's the Webb formula -- one he employed successfully as a senator from Virginia. Take a problem, gather together the brightest minds you can find, examine it from every angle, then chart a course to fix it. It doesn't fit into a convenient sound bite, nor does it give the level of detail that politically savvy voters in Iowa and New Hampshire want to chew over. But it is classic Webb style.

"The most important thing a leader can do is to reach out and get good people -- the best minds in the country to come together and figure out solutions -- to give a vision of where you want the country to go," Webb told Fox News.

Webb has a reputation for meticulously thinking through every issue with the perseverance of an academic before rendering an opinion -- as he did earlier this week with a Facebook posting about the Confederate flag. Webb decreed that the issue was "complicated" and that any discussion about the flag needed to recognize that the majority of soldiers who fought for the South did not own slaves and that the nation needs "to respect good people who fought on both sides."

Many of Webb's most ardent fans saw it as a defense of a flag that has come to symbolize racism and vigorously disagreed with him.

"The Confederate battle flag was a battle flag," Webb told Fox News. "It was misused particularly during the civil rights era as a racist and political symbol. And I am fine with it coming down from public fora. At the same time, let's remember our history and let's not turn the acts of people who fought on either side in the Civil War into something they were not."

The nuance Webb expresses is a departure for most presidential candidates who speak in short, declarative sentences. Between his thought processes and his background in the military, politics and private sector, he has been described as a person who has the potential to be 'the most interesting candidate in the race.' Certainly, voters who spend time with him come away with a favorable opinion. But the big question -- can Webb take on the juggernaut that is the Hillary Clinton campaign?

Webb is confident.

"If I didn't think it was possible, I would not do it," Webb told Fox News.

Webb points to his Senate race, when he beat incumbent George Allen in Virginia. Webb was 33 points behind nine months before the race and managed to win. Of course, it helped that Allen imploded over his now-infamous "macaca" comments.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Can lightning strike twice? Could Hillary falter? Talk to Democratic voters in Iowa and many will tell you they are open to an alternative.

"We don't do coronations here, we do discussions," said Dr. Andy McGuire, chairwoman of the Iowa Democratic Party.

Even if Webb has no chance to become the nominee, his entry into the race would certainly add new energy to the debate, though voters may be hungry for a little more detail than Webb is presently willing to provide.

Joe Biden's presidential decision hinges on family // Delaware Online // Nicole Gaudiano – June 27, 2015

WASHINGTON – Vice President Joe Biden has a top concern as he considers whether to run for president: family.

The two-time presidential candidate believes he would offer something unique to the country as president, said supporter Dick Harpootlian, a former South Carolina Democratic Party chairman. But he said Biden is weighing the needs of his family following the May 30 death of his 46-year-old son Beau, Delaware's former attorney general.

"He is thinking about [a presidential run]," said Harpootlian, who spoke with Biden on May 19 and had more recent talks with people close to the vice president. "It's all about his personal situation – 'Can I do this and not in any way deny my family what I can give them or do for them?' This is a decision about his family."

Biden's supporters say it would be understandable if he decides to sit out the 2016 presidential campaign. Beau Biden's death from brain cancer was yet another tragic loss for the 72-year-old vice president. His first wife Neilia and 13-month-old daughter Naomi were killed in a December 1972 car accident that also injured Beau Biden and his brother, Hunter.

But the vice president has a history of working through overwhelming grief.

"No one would blame him if he said, 'You know, look, it's just too much,'" Harpootlian said. But he added, "He's a tough guy and he fights his way through tough times."

Biden served 36 years in the Senate representing Delaware after senators persuaded him in January 1973 to take his first oath of office -- which he did next to his son's hospital bed.

Biden has spent time in Delaware in recent weeks, but four days after his son's funeral he returned to the White House for lunch with President Barack Obama and an afternoon meeting with Ukrainian Prime Minister Arseniy Yatsenyuk to discuss that country's reform agenda.

"One thing about the vice president that we all know: He's very resilient," said William Pierce, executive director of the Draft Biden 2016 super PAC.

Biden is expected to announce in August whether he will run for president. Draft Biden, launched by former staffers and campaign veterans, is hiring staff in Iowa and New Hampshire and raising funds for independent expenditures in support of a possible Biden candidacy. The group so far has nearly 100,000 signatures on a petition urging Biden to run and is planning a rally in Wilmington in late July.

"We're taking it to his backyard... just to show him that his community is behind him as well," Pierce said.

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton has a sizable lead in polls that include Biden. In a Monmouth University Poll released June 16, Clinton was supported by 57 percent of Democrats and Democratic-leaning voters nationwide, compared to 12 percent for Biden and 12 percent for Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, an independent running for the Democratic nomination. Biden would be fighting for Clinton supporters, who are ideologically similar, said Patrick Murray, director of the polling institute.

But he said it would be a mistake to evaluate Biden's potential based on early "horse race" polls. The June 16 survey also showed that 62 percent of Democrats view Biden favorably, compared to 78 percent for Clinton.

"It suggests that there are people out there who would support him," Murray said. "The question is whether there are enough to overcome Hillary's initial advantage."

Biden has said he wouldn't be influenced by Clinton's decision to run.

"The only reason to run for the president of the United States is if you truly believe you're in a better position to do what you think is most needed in the country," Biden said in February on The View.

His supporters say there's still room for another Democratic candidate.

"I don't think Hillary is really the presumptive candidate everybody thinks she is," said Iowa Rep. Bruce Hunter, a Biden supporter who represents south and central Des Moines.

Harpootlian said Biden, former chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, knows foreign policy and the legislative process, and has personal skills Clinton lacks.

"Joe Biden is a person that can speak to crowds and to people individually and emote and inspire them and bring them to tears or bring them to their feet cheering," Harpootlian said. "That ain't (Clinton's) skill."

Beau Biden clearly wanted his father to run for president, said Harpootlian, who last saw the younger Biden at the 2012 Democratic National Convention.

Harpootlian said he spoke with Joe Biden in May about presidential campaign logistics, including how much it would cost for a vice president to visit battleground states, and South Carolina's political landscape.

Biden would openly express pride in the Obama administration's accomplishments if he runs for president, Harpootlian said. But he said Biden realizes some Americans have missed out on the economic recovery because of a financial system that favors the wealthy.

"I think he'd spend the next eight years trying to correct that," he said.

With Sanders and Chafee in state, Clinton and O'Malley supporters on hand, Democratic competition on full display in N.H. // Concord Monitor // Casey McDermott – June 28, 2015

You didn't need to travel far in New Hampshire on Saturday to understand this much about the Democratic presidential primary: It's on.

In fact, if you were in Nashua on Saturday morning, you didn't need to travel more than a few miles.

Over at the Clinton campaign headquarters on Main Street at 10 a.m., Massachusetts Congressman Joe Kennedy III and others were galvanizing a few dozen Hillary Clinton volunteers before spreading out for the campaign's first "Day of Action" – the first of many planned door-knocking efforts of the 2016 primary. A similar kickoff rolled out in Concord, Keene, Manchester, Portsmouth and a handful of other locations across the state.

Thirty minutes later, in the gymnasium of Nashua Community College on the other side of Nashua, U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont was motivating several hundred supporters of his own – urging them to believe in the viability of his goal to take on "the billionaire class," and not to give in to those who would label his agenda as one that's too extreme.

"This is the agenda of America," Sanders declared after outlining a policy vision that included calls for a move toward public financing of political campaigns, a transition to a single-payer health system, a swift attempt to curb the effects of climate change, guaranteed family and sick leave for American workers and guaranteed vacation time. The senator brought the audience to its feet several times during his speech.

"Don't let anybody tell you or allow them to define me as some kind of extremist, out-of-touch with the American people," Sanders implored the crowd. "Virtually every issue that I have talked about, every proposal I have brought forth has the support of the vast majority of Americans. The people who do not have the support of the American people are those Republicans who want tax breaks for billionaires, to cut social security, Medicare, Medicaid, et cetera. They are way out of touch."

The main target of Sanders' criticism was the Republican party, not any Democratic opponent. He urged the audience in Nashua to challenge friends and family who might think of voting with the other party, adding: "What I will not accept is working class people in New Hampshire, in Vermont and around this country voting against their own best interests and the interests of their kids."

Sanders continued on to several other stops: A house party in Bow that attracted about 100 people from New Hampshire and neighboring states, a Blue BBQ with the Hillsborough and Antrim Town Democrats and a "town meeting" at New England College in Henniker. He had another full day of events scheduled for Sunday, with more "town meetings" planned in Rochester, Durham and Laconia.

Meanwhile, Clinton's team brought in several out-of-state surrogates to canvass on the candidate's behalf this weekend: There was Kennedy in Nashua, as well as Massachusetts Congresswoman Niki Tsongas in Salem, and New York Congressman Sean Patrick Maloney (a New Hampshire native) in Manchester.

And all of the declared Democratic contenders' campaigns converged – at one point or another – at the barbecue in Hillsborough.

Former Rhode Island governor Lincoln Chafee spoke at the event and spent time mingling with attendees, one of several trips to the state he made this week. Sanders was the only other candidate to speak in person – but Maloney stopped by to speak on Clinton's behalf, and former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley sent a representative from his campaign, too.

Also at the event was campaign finance reformer and Harvard University professor Lawrence Lessig, who continued his calls asking New Hampshire residents to make election funding a priority as they vet candidates in the months ahead.

While Clinton volunteers hit the streets and Sanders's camp rallied followers for a campaign that focused on "educat(ing) and organiz(ing)," Chafee, in an interview at the picnic, was taking the long view. Unlike Clinton, Sanders and O'Malley, he hasn't yet hired staff in New Hampshire or led any organized volunteers yet. As Clinton continues to lead in recent polls, with Sanders not far behind, Chafee has not yet managed to pick up much momentum. Still, Chafee said he's optimistic that there's room for him in the race – he even pointed to Sanders' recent surge in the polls as proof that Democrats are eager for a competitive primary.

"I think the Democrats are kicking the tires," Chafee said, sitting on a picnic bench at the Hillsborough Fire Department Picnic Grounds on Saturday afternoon. "They want to hear from the candidates. I don't think they're 100 percent committed to Hillary or Bernie or Linc or Marty yet. They're listening. That's good."

As some take sides, others still weighing options

Across the Democrats' events in New Hampshire yesterday, there seemed to be a consensus that – for the moment, at least – the main rivalry for the liberal wing of the Granite State exists between Clinton and Sanders.

Clinton's supporters at the Nashua office pointed to the former U.S. senator and secretary of state's credentials, leadership style and policy expertise as key factors in their decision to back her bid for presidency. Sanders, several said, has good ideas – but seemed less experienced on foreign policy and perhaps too outspoken to work with other policymakers in a meaningful way. Others expressed hesitancy because of his stance on gun control. (Sanders has supported an assault weapons ban and backed President Obama's call for gun control in the wake of the Sandy Hook shooting, as noted by the Boston Globe earlier this month. On the other hand, the as Globe reported, "Sanders voted against the landmark Brady Bill, which required background checks and a waiting period before purchasing a firearm. He supported legislation allowing guns to be transported on Amtrak trains. He voted for a measure to protect gun manufacturers from lawsuits in cases of shootings."

In comments Saturday and other recent interviews, he stressed that it's important to understand the significance of hunting and recreational gun use for Americans in more rural areas.)

"I think Bernie might be her biggest competition. Vermont is a strong liberal state, and I love him, and he's doing so much. She's my preference," said Sonia Prince, a Nashua resident who's volunteering for Clinton. "Sometimes he's a little harsh, and I wonder how that would go over in certain situations. I think she can handle herself better. And the gun thing is a huge deal for me."

Sanders' supporters, meanwhile, voiced a sense of elation – and, in some cases, pleasant surprise – that their candidate was attracting so much enthusiasm at this stage in the race. New Hampshire voters (some sporting "Feel the Bern" and "Bern, Baby, Bern") were not turned off by the Senator's willingness to be blunt – indeed, that was part of what they liked best. Some expressed skepticism that Clinton could be the same kind of champion for middle class families that Sanders is trying to be, and some said they were questioning Clinton's trustworthiness because of the issues recently raised surrounding her email practices as secretary of state, among other things.

"He's a stand-up man. And he tends to be kind of a firecracker, and if he doesn't agree with something, he says something. He does something," said Nashua resident Jennifer Craffey, who attended the rally in Nashua. "I like that his initials are B.S. – and he's sick of the B.S. down in D.C."

And then, there are still plenty of residents who are still weighing their options. Peter Beblowski and Martha Pinello, both of Antrim, said at the Hillsborough picnic that they're happy to have several strong potential choices on the Democratic side.

"I think we're looking at the retail politics that New Hampshire provides," Beblowski said. "This is way in advance of 2016."

"One of the things that's great is that you get to see candidates repeatedly, so you not only get to read their positions but you get to see how they interact with their staff and how they interact with voters," Pinello added.

Even for all of the talk of Clinton's frontrunner status, the sense of competition ahead of canvassing efforts was evident. In Nashua yesterday morning, State Sen. Bette Lasky reminded the group that no New Hampshire primary (in recent decades, at least) has been won with more than 50 percent of the vote.

"We know firsthand that we have to start working today, continue, don't let up," Lasky told the group. "And do not leave any stone unturned until 8 p.m. on primary day."

The Definition of Insanity: Jeb Bush still favors appointing judges "with a proven record of judicial restraint" // WaPo // Randy Barnett – June 27. 2015

In an interview with Hugh Hewitt, Jeb Bush responded to criticism of his brother's selection of John Roberts to be Chief Justice. Without intending it, his answer revealed he would select judges by exactly the same criteria that has given us our current problem with a Supreme Court that is dominated by Republican nominated justices:

> "When I was governor, we tried to find people with a proven record of judicial restraint, and people that were committed to enforcing the constitutional limits on government authority. In essence, what I'm saying is I think we need to have people that have not just theoretically, but have had a proven record of not legislating from the bench."

He then doubled down:

> "All justices disappoint their presidents some of the time but Souter was like a 90 percent swing and miss," Hewitt said. "How do you avoid Souters?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

> "You focus on people to be Supreme Court justices who have a proven record of judicial restraint," Bush answered.

This is exactly the problem with the judicial philosophy promoted by many conservatives for the past 30 years: "judicial restraint" in "enforcing constitutional limits on government authority" leads to NFIB v. Sebelius. In fairness, that is not what Bush actually said but, as George Will recently observed, that is what this judicial philosophy produces in practice.

Thoughtful conservatives today will insist that, properly defined, "judicial restraint" includes enforcing constitutional limits, and the term could be defined that way. But that is not the mentality of "restraint" as it was originally formulated by the Progressives and has been perpetuated by some conservatives. For years, "judicial restraint" has been primarily about not thwarting the will of "democratic majorities." There are myriad doctrines to accomplish this. For example, you adopt a "presumption of constitutionality" that cannot be rebutted. Or find a "saving construction" of a statute to avoid finding it unconstitutional. Or you "defer" to administrative agencies' interpretation of statutes. Or you make a statute "work" as the "legislature intended" (even if that means ignoring the plain or natural reading of its words).

Many good conservatives truly wanted Obamacare invalidated in NFIB because it was unconstitutional. And they then sincerely wanted it to be enforced according to its terms in King. But selecting judges with the judicial mindset of "judicial restraint" and "deference" to the majoritarian branches leads to the results we witnessed in NFIB and King. If conservatives persist in supporting presidents who select judges on this basis, they will persist in being disappointed.

I know, I know. What about Obergefell and gay marriage? Didn't that result from a lack of "restraint"? No, if you don't approve of Obergefell, it is because you do not agree with the constitutional rationale Justice Kennedy articulated for invalidating the state laws at issue, not because he was "unrestrained." Winning Obergefell on the grounds urged by Chief Justice Roberts in his dissenting opinion also gives you NFIB and King. If you want to avoid the latter, then you should criticize the majority on the ground that Justice Thomas did in his dissent: that the majority misinterpreted the Due Process Clause, not that they were "unrestrained." You will notice that Chief Justice Roberts did not join Justice Thomas's dissent (though regrettably, Justices Thomas and Scalia joined his). The Chief Justice's dissent was all about restraint and only secondarily about correctness. He cited Lochner v. New York 16 times because Lochner was supposedly about activism, rather than appropriate restraint. In contrast, Justice Thomas appealed to the original meaning of "the due process of law." There is a big big difference between these two judicial mindsets.

So, if conservative Republicans want a different performance from the judiciary in the future, they must vet their presidential candidates to see whether they understand this point. Jeb Bush clearly does not. And I have personally heard Marco Rubio and Carly Fiorina say much the same sort of thing about judges, showing that they do not understand this either–at least not yet. Only Rand Paul has been very clear about the duty of judges to invalidate unconstitutional law without restraint or deference.

I haven't heard yet what other candidates think about this, but everyone should be listening closely. If you hear catch phrases like "judicial restraint," "deferring" to "the democratic branches," or "not legislating from the bench," then you know this candidate intends to repeat the mistakes of past Republican presidents.

Conservatives must learn from the recent past what not to look for in a justice.

Bush to meet with Charleston pastors // WaPo // Ed O'Keefe – June 27, 2015

Jeb Bush plans to meet privately on Monday with pastors in Charleston, S.C., his campaign says.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Republican presidential candidate was originally scheduled to be in Charleston 10 days ago for an event scheduled for the morning after a deadly shooting at a historic African American church in the city. After arriving in the city just hours after the shooting, Bush canceled his scheduled appearance, saying it would be inappropriate to campaign in the city in the wake of the shooting.

His campaign declined to say with whom he will meet with on Monday.

Later in the day, the former Florida governor is scheduled to hold a campaign event in West Columbia, S.C., at a pharmaceutical company.

Jeb Bush touts record on guns // CNN // Ashley Killough – June 27, 2015

Henderson, Nevada (CNN) Jeb Bush on Saturday said he doubted gun control measures supported by President Barack Obama would have prevented recent tragedies, including the church massacre in South Carolina.

Instead, the former Florida governor, speaking at a town hall event in the early caucus state of Nevada, touted his record on guns as a way to balance public safety and Second Amendment rights.

"Florida is a pro-gun state. Gun violence has dropped. There's a reason for it," he told reporters after the event. "We created a balance that's focused on lowering gun violence but protecting the Second Amendment, and it's a model for many other countries and many other states because of that."

Bush proudly touted his A+ rating with the National Rifle Association and called Florida a "freedom-loving state," but also cited his efforts to combat crime through the "10-20-Life" law, a statute that he campaigned on and enacted as governor.

The law, which is still in place, issues a minimum 10-year sentence for anyone who pulls a gun while committing a crime, 20 years for pulling the trigger during a crime and 25 years to life for injuring or killing someone by firing a gun.

"And we advertised it in Spanish, Creole and English to make sure that people knew that if they're going to commit gun crimes, that they were going to pay a heavy price," he said in the town hall, adding that they saw a "dramatic reductions in gun violence."

According to a 2013 report by the nonpartisan research arm of the Connecticut General Assembly, which looked into the law using FBI crime reporting statistics, gun violence in Florida indeed went down in the years after the law was enacted in 1999 -- but it also went down across the entire country.

Separately, an Orlando Sentinel report found that only a small percentage of those charged with gun crime in Orange County from 2003 to 2007 actually received the mandatory sentence.

Bush argued that none of the gun control proposals by the Obama administration would have stopped recent mass shootings. Asked by reporters afterwards if he could specify which proposals he was talking about, he repeated, "all the ones."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Every one of them. There's not been a single thing that he's proposed recently that would have changed the course of any of these tragic cases," he said.

Following the Newtown elementary school shooting in 2012, the Obama administration, with the help of a small number of Republicans, pushed for legislation that would have applied background checks to all private sales or transfers, but the measure failed to advance in the Senate two years ago.

While Bush said Florida requires background checks for gun purchases, he told reporters that the state does not have checks for the kinds of private transactions included in the Congressional push two years ago.

He said he doesn't think "we need to be politicizing this issue," and in the town hall, he emphasized focusing on mental health issues as a way to address the problem.

"I'd also say going forward that these cases -- that the race system in Charleston or these cases of people who are just mentally deranged -- we as a society better figure out how we identify these folks long before they feel compelled to take up a gun and kill innocent people," he said.

In his first stop to Nevada as an official candidate, having announced his presidential campaign earlier this month, the town hall in Henderson was largely a friendly event for Bush. At one point, a voter stood up and told him he'd been a Democrat for 50 years but last month switched to become a registered Republican. Bush approached the voter and gave him a hug.

While he faced no confrontational questions at the event, a small group of pro-immigration protesters with signs waited for Bush outside, standing near reporters who were anticipating a small press conference. Bush's campaign then moved reporters inside where the candidate answered questions.

Bush pledged to return to the early caucus state "a lot," not only for the Republican nominating contest, but because Nevada is a swing state in the general election.

He acknowledged that the Republican nominee won't be able to win Democratic strongholds like New York and California next November, but he thinks Republicans can expand the map to win Nevada, Florida, New Hampshire, Iowa, Colorado, New Mexico, Pennsylvania and Michigan.

"I'm going to do this to win," he said to applause during the town hall. "And I want your support."

That will require campaigning in places where Republicans don't traditionally go, he said, and appealing to groups like Latino voters, repeating a message he often gives. This time, however, he tried using a gambling term to get across his message.

"If we don't try to broaden out the map, we're going to have to win with an inside straight, to use a Vegas term. Inside straight flush or whatever. It's just not going to happen. I'm not a big gambler so I don't know any gambling ... Does that sound stupid when you say that?" he asked, to laughs. "You'll teach me about that later."

Jeb Bush: Charleston shootings wouldn't have been prevented by Obama proposals // CBS // Alan He – June 27, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb Bush told an audience today in Henderson, Nevada that "not a single one" of the mass shootings in recent years would have been prevented by President Obama's gun control ideas, and that more emphasis should be put on the role of mental health in gun violence. Bush's comments came just a day after President Obama said that the nation had been, "blind to the unique mayhem that gun violence inflicts," for far too long.

Answering an audience question about his stance on gun control, Bush said that, "all of these tragic incidents that have taken place in the past few years, are heartbreaking," but that, "not a single one of them would have been stopped by any of the ideas proposed by Barack Obama." The Republican candidate referring to alleged killer Dylann Roof as the "racist in Charleston," instead argued that, "we as a society better figure out how we identify these folks long before they feel compelled to take up a gun and kill innocent people."

On Monday, Bush heads to Charleston, South Carolina to meet privately with community faith leaders who he described Saturday as having shown, "incredible love and compassion" in the wake of the shooting.

During a press conference held in the hallway after the town hall in the gymnasium had ended, the former Florida governor responded to reporters' questions about the recent Supreme Court decisions upholding Obamacare and the right to same-sex marriage. Bush said that he was "disappointed" by both decisions. He described a constitutional amendment banning same sex marriage as "unrealistic," calling for an environment where, "people aren't discriminated against," while also allowing "people to act on their religious conscience."

On the subject of Obamacare, Bush had told the town hall audience that his solution would be to replace it with a system that provides people with access to a high-deductible, low-premium catastrophic coverage.

Bush also touted his own openness and willingness to "step outside his comfort zone," in contrast to the Democratic candidate, former Secretary State, Hillary Clinton. He drew audience laughter when he invoked Clinton's Scooby Van, saying. "I will make mistakes along the way because I'm going to campaign outside my comfort zone. I'm not going to be in a little protective shell, I'm not going to be inside of a bubble. I'm not going to go on my Scooby Doo van and have everything screened out."

Jeb Bush: U.S. needs to strengthen economically and internationally // Las Vegas Review-Journal // Ben Botkin – June 27, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush told an audience in Henderson that the United States needs to strengthen its economy and its relationships with other nations, including Israel.

Speaking to about 300 people at a town hall meeting Saturday, he said personal income and disposable income need to grow, which hasn't happened in this economy.

"More and more people are falling prey to the false choice of more government to be able to take care of them," Bush said at the city's Valley View Recreation Center.

Bush, the governor of Florida from 1999 to 2007, touted key parts of his campaign message, including reducing federal regulations that harm businesses and reducing poverty.

"All of this can be fixed because it requires winning in a way that draws people to our cause," Bush said, adding "I'm going to run with heart."

It was the Bush's first visit to Southern Nevada since his June 15 announcement that he's in the race. Bush, the brother of former President George W. Bush and the son of the first President George Bush, visited Reno and Las Vegas in May.

Bush, a friend of Republican Gov. Brian Sandoval, also praised Nevada for its work on education reform, particularly the new education savings accounts.

The new voucher program will allow parents to put their child's state public school funding toward a private school or tutoring. Bush championed a voucher program in Florida as governor.

Asked about the deadly June 17 shooting spree in Charleston, S.C., where a gunman killed nine people in a church, Bush said a society needs to focus on mental health issues and look for ways to identify and help people with mental health problems sooner.

Bush drew frequent applause at the town hall, which offered online registration for free tickets in advance.

Considered a GOP presidential race front-runner, Bush leads most polls in a crowded field of at least a dozen Republican candidates. A recent NBC/Wall Street Journal national survey placed him at the top, preferred by 22 percent of likely Republican primary voters.

Nevada has attracted attention from other candidates who have visited in recent months. The list includes Republicans U.S. Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida, neurosurgeon Dr. Ben Carson, U.S. Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky, and Democratic candidates Hillary Clinton and U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont.

Bush said accountability is needed at the federal Office of Personnel Management, which suffered a data breach and did nothing after an Inspector General report suggested the agency that houses the government workforce's personnel files wasn't secure.

"The Chinese have broken into that system and now it's possible they have 18 million separate records," Bush said, adding that President Barack Obama put his political director in charge of the agency rather than someone qualified. Katherine Archuleta, who was Obama's national political director, heads the agency.

Bush criticized her for blaming the Chinese, saying people need to take action and responsibility.

As Florida's governor, "when there was a mistake, I cleaned it up," he said.

Nevada's status as a key swing state in the presidential election wasn't lost on Bush. Nevada's February 2016 caucuses will play an early role in determining who gets the Republican nomination, along with New Hampshire, South Carolina and Iowa. In the November 2016 general election, Nevada is expected to be competitive: It could swing for the GOP or the Democratic ticket.

"We're purple as well," Bush said, referring to his Florida home state. "And Republicans will win if we win purple states."

Bush sharply criticized Obama's foreign policy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“This president is the first president in the post-World War II era that believes we’re not a force for good,” Bush said.

He said the U.S. needs to be a “beacon of peace and security for the world.”

Asked about Iran and its nuclear capabilities, Bush said no option should be taken off the table. Iran and its potential ability to have a nuclear weapon have stoked fears in the Middle East.

Bush also took aim at Democratic front-runner Clinton, saying she only sponsored three bills that became law during her eight years as a U.S. senator representing New York.

The Democratic National Committee quickly pounced on Bush’s comments in Henderson that Obama’s economics have been horrible for people in poverty and disastrous for those in the middle. The committee said private-sector jobs have expanded by 12.6 million jobs during 63 consecutive months and wages and benefits increased last year at the quickest rate in six years.

Both Democratic and Republican candidates are courting the Latino vote as demographics have shifted.

“The next president has to go to places where Republicans haven’t been seen in a long, long while,” Bush said, referencing the Latino community.

He didn’t call for a path to citizenship for immigrants who are in the country illegally. Instead, he said they should be eligible for “earned legal status.” That status would come through a provisional work permit where they pay taxes and learn English and “over an extended period of time” earn legal status, Bush said.

“I don’t see any other option,” Bush said. “I don’t think our country is going to be the type of country that puts people in boxcars and sends them away.”

Several Latino protesters were outside the building, holding signs that said: “Jeb: Are you a supporter or a deporter?” and “Nothing less than citizenship.”

Bush, speaking to reporters after his speech, said he believes in traditional marriage and that it’s important to protect religious freedoms. He was responding to a question about the U.S. Supreme Court’s ruling Friday that the U.S. Constitution guarantees a nationwide right to same-sex marriage.

Bush plans to meet with ministers in Charleston, S.C., on Monday.

Jeb Bush says stricter US gun control laws aren't needed // Sydney Morning Herald // Kurtis Lee – June 27, 2015

Former Florida Governor Jeb Bush has argued against calls from President Barack Obama and other Democrats for stricter gun control laws after the mass shooting at a Charleston, South Carolina, church that killed nine people.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr Bush, who travelled to the Las Vegas suburb of Henderson on Saturday for a campaign appearance, said he does not believe tougher gun laws would prevent mass shootings.

"All of these tragic instances that have taken place in the last couple of years are heartbreaking. They really are," said Mr Bush. "Not a single one of them would have been stopped with any of the ideas proposed by Barack Obama. Not a single one of them."

Mr Bush, among the front-runners in the race for the Republican presidential nomination, said more emphasis should be placed on improving access to mental health services. On Monday, he plans to meet with black ministers in Charleston.

Meanwhile, Hillary Rodham Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination, in recent days has called for universal background checks for gun purchases, noting the "politics on the issue have been poisoned".

Mr Bush has received strong support from the National Rifle Association, and as Florida governor he signed the "stand your ground" law that received attention after the Trayvon Martin shooting.

On Saturday, Mr Bush said gun laws should be a state issue.

"In Florida we had background checks, state by state I think these things get sorted out based on tradition, based on the differences in our states," he said.

Mr Bush said he supported a Florida law that requires background checks on some gun sales.

"We've created a balance that's focused on lowering gun violence, but protecting the Second Amendment," he said regarding the Florida laws.

RUBIO

Rubio Buys Airtime for Campaign Ads in First Four Nominating States // WSJ // Patrick O'Connor – June 27, 2015

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, a leading contender for the Republican presidential nomination, has started reserving television airtime in the first four nominating states, seven months before a vote is cast, according to a people familiar with the advertising purchase.

The Florida senator has reserved airtime in Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada that is set to run from November through February, according to someone familiar with the reservation.

The Republican presidential nominating process gets under way in February, when New Hampshire and South Carolina hold primaries, while Iowa and Nevada are set for caucuses.

By reserving ads early, the Rubio team should be able to secure lower rates than some of its rivals will pay if they buy airtime closer to the primary voting.

PAUL

Rand Paul silent on gay marriage ruling // Politico // Daniel Strauss – June 27, 2015

Ted Cruz called for impeachment. Bobby Jindal said he'd "just get rid of the court" entirely. Scott Walker floated a Constitutional amendment. Mike Huckabee hinted at civil disobedience.

But well over 24 hours after the Supreme Court's historic ruling making same-sex marriage legal in all 50 states, one Republican 2016 candidate has thus far remained silent: Rand Paul.

While other GOP hopefuls bashed the high court's decision to one degree or another, the Kentucky senator didn't say anything or release a statement or respond to requests for comment from POLITICO.

Paul's silence stands in contrast to his voluble response on Thursday, when the justices upheld a key part of the Affordable Care Act. He released a statement saying the decision "turns both the rule of law and common sense on its head." He was still going on Friday afternoon, tweeting, "while some in my party may want to wave the white flag, I am more determined than ever to fight for total repeal of Obamacare." No tweets, however, on gay marriage.

By Saturday, Paul had also tweeted about his poll numbers and the "hackathon for liberty and privacy" sponsored by his campaign and made numerous requests for donation.

Again, though, there was no mention of gay marriage of the high court's landmark ruling earlier that day — on any of the candidate's many social media accounts.

Paul's habit of initial silence on the hot political topic of the day has been noted by the national press recently, especially his delayed response to Mitt Romney's call for the Confederate flag to be taken down from Capitol grounds in South Carolina. Paul finally weighed in on Tuesday, days after Romney's Saturday tweet, and well after his rivals had already made statements. The Kentucky senator's silence on the gay marriage ruling is another example of that pattern.

Paul hasn't refrained from talking about gay marriage before, however. In April, in an interview with CNN's Dana Bash, Paul said he believed "people ought to be treated fairly under the law" but also said he believed in the "traditional religious connotation" of marriage, usually defined by religious conservatives as between a man and a woman.

"And you probably could have both," Paul added. "You could have both traditional marriage, which I believe in. And then you could also have the neutrality of the law that allows people to have contracts with another."

In a 2013 interview with the American Family Association's Bryan Fischer, Paul voiced reservations about "federalizing" same-sex marriage.

"I'm not sure exactly how I'd come down on the federalization part," Paul said in the January 2013 interview. "My fear is that in federalizing it, we're going to lose the battle for the whole country. In keeping it state by state, which is the way marriage has always been adjudicated, we'll have states that continue to have traditional marriage. I think we're losing in large areas of the country now. If the urban areas are able to dictate, for the rest of the country, what our definition of marriage is, I'm really concerned about that."

CRUZ

Ted Cruz calls for judicial retention elections for Supreme Court justices // WaPo // Katie Zezima – June 27, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.) has proposed a constitutional amendment that would subject Supreme Court justices to periodic judicial elections in the wake of rulings that upheld a key portion of the Affordable Care Act and affirmed gay couples' right to marriage.

"I am proposing an amendment to the U.S. Constitution that would subject each and every justice of the United States Supreme Court to periodic judicial retention elections," Cruz said Saturday, during a speech in Des Moines, Iowa. He also called for such elections in the National Review on Friday.

The proposal from Cruz, who once served as Supreme Court clerk, comes as he is trying to position himself as the presidential candidate of choice for conservatives and evangelicals who disagree with the court's decisions this week. The Texas Republican is using the rulings to paint himself as a stalwart defender of religious freedom, opponent of same-sex marriage and reaffirm his pledge to abolish the Affordable Care Act should he win the presidency.

Cruz is also using the rulings to reemphasize his assertion that he tacks far to the right of the rest of the 2016 GOP field when it comes to social issues, a point he started making in the wake of a controversial religious freedom law Indiana passed in March.

"Sadly we've seen several 2016 candidates in response to yesterday's decision saying it is the law of the land, we must accept it and move on," Cruz said as the Des Moines audience booed. "When Republican candidates are standing up and reciting Barack Obama's talking points things have gone seriously wrong."

Earlier this year Cruz filed legislation that would protect states that prohibit same-sex couples from getting married.

Cruz said last week in Iowa that some Republican presidential candidates chose to "rearrange their sock drawers" in the wake of the Indiana decision. After a backlash to the initial law, Indiana Gov. Mike Pence (R) signed a revised version of the religious freedom bill making it clear that businesses cannot use the legislation as the basis to discriminate based on sexual orientation.

The Texas Republican, who had a tepid start in Iowa, tried to use Saturday's speech, titled "Believe Again" as a way to both solidify his presence in the state and as the uncompromising conservative in the 2016 field. Cruz has come up with a new phrase for the institution he said he is fighting: the "Washington cartel," which he said is comprised by members of both parties, lobbyists, and now Supreme Court justices.

"This week's assault was but the latest in a long line of judicial assaults on our Constitution and Judeo-Christian values that have made America great," he said. The Supreme Court "has now forced the disaster of a health-care law called Obamacare on the American people and attempted to redefine an institution that was ordained by God."

Cruz's strategy is to coalesce the support of his conservative base and draw in support from evangelical

Christians and conservative libertarians, all but ignoring the Republican establishment and moderates. Cruz said he is the only candidate in the field who is bucking Republican leadership, and said those leaders have been "embarrassed" to stand up for traditional marriage. He said both Democrats and Republicans were "popping Champagne" after the court's rulings because it spared them from having the government "actually follow the law."

The candidate also hit 2012 GOP nominee Mitt Romney, who held a Republican summit earlier this month, for inviting all of the candidates who are "pro-amnesty" on immigration to Utah.

Ted Cruz Recalls How Father Tried to Join Fidel Castro's Army // AP – June 27, 2015

AUSTIN, Tex. — The father of Senator Ted Cruz was a 1950s Cuban revolutionary who longed to slip into the island's eastern mountains and join Fidel Castro's guerrilla army.

At 17, Rafael Cruz led a group of insurgents staging urban sabotage against Fulgencio Batista, a Cuban dictator. Mr. Cruz was eventually jailed and tortured, and upon his release wanted the underground to help him reach Mr. Castro's camp in the Sierra Maestra highlands.

"My dad asked if he could join Castro in the mountains and keep fighting," Senator Cruz, Republican of Texas and a presidential candidate, writes in his book, "A Time For Truth," which is being released on Tuesday. "But he was told there was no way to get to the rebels."

Instead, the elder Cruz bribed his way to a Cuban exit visa and headed to the University of Texas.

He returned home shortly after Mr. Castro seized power in 1959, but, Ted Cruz writes, was appalled to see Mr. Castro had "declared to the world that he was a Communist." Mr. Castro did not formally call his revolution Socialist until the eve of the Bay of Pigs invasion in 1961.

The Cruzes have long acknowledged that Rafael Cruz was an early Castro sympathizer. But Ted Cruz's memoir — a copy of which The Associated Press purchased — provides new details about his desire to fight alongside the guerrilla leader.

The Cuban government has not commented about Rafael Cruz, making the anecdotes difficult to confirm. But Ted Cruz also writes that his father had planned to join Mr. Castro and help attack an army barracks in the city of Santiago in 1956, but did not because Mr. Castro was delayed in returning to Cuba from Mexico.

Today, Rafael Cruz, 76, is a pastor who frequently quotes scripture in antigovernment speeches to grass-roots groups. He has compared President Obama to a young Castro.

Ted Cruz writes that his father did not open up about being tortured in Cuban jails until the senator was a teenager, when the pair watched "Rambo." The movie features scenes in which the title character is tortured.

The senator describes how his father said he was beaten with clubs and kicked in the head. That is also difficult to confirm, but the book includes a Rafael Cruz mug shot in which his nose appears to be broken.

In the book, Mr. Cruz briefly tells how his elder half sister, Miriam, died of a drug overdose in 2011. He discusses the bouts of depression that his wife, Heidi, had in 2005 — which he chalks up to her having trouble adjusting to Texas life after the couple moved to Austin from Washington.

Mr. Cruz also recalls heading to Maine in 2009 to meet former President George H. W. Bush — whose son Jeb is now one of Mr. Cruz's 2016 presidential campaign rivals. Mr. Cruz was invited to go sailing but was wearing a suit, so Mr. Bush lent him clothes, including a "President of the United States" belt buckle.

Mr. Cruz writes that the borrowed clothing felt "surreal."

Cruz seeks to harness conservative outrage after Supreme Court decisions // CNN // Theodore Schleifer – June 27, 2015

Orange City, Iowa (CNN) Ted Cruz is moving quickly to galvanize conservatives frustrated by the Supreme Court's landmark decisions this week.

Hours after the Supreme Court legalized same-sex marriage on Friday morning, the Texas Republican senator looked to pivot the defeat for social conservatives into a wedge issue between himself and his rival presidential hopefuls. And by the end of his day in Iowa, Cruz was outflanking any of the other aspirants on the right and was continuously accusing them of doublespeak.

In stops across northwest Iowa, Cruz said many in the GOP were "popping champagne" after the decision. He took swipes at both the integrity of the Supreme Court and his longtime friend, Chief Justice John Roberts. He suggested he would back a constitutional convention to scale back the high court's power, and concluded the day by calling for an amendment to the Constitution that would give voters the chance to end a Supreme Court justice's lifetime tenure early.

If Cruz was looking to emerge as the presidential candidate who took the most umbrage, who expressed the most disbelief after both the same-sex marriage ruling and the Court's decision to uphold a key provision of Obamacare this week, he made his best try here on Friday.

"This is not a typical moment in American history," Cruz told a crowd of more than 100 Iowans gathered on a baseball diamond in the small town of Pierson. "The last 24 hours at the United States Supreme Court were among the darkest hours of our nation."

Cruz, a former clerk to Chief Justice William Rehnquist who later represented the state of Texas in arguments at the Supreme Court, was originally slow to respond to the news out of Washington on Friday morning. His delay was especially surprising as the tea party hero is making an aggressive play to win over the family-focused evangelical voters who are expected to make up half of the electorate in next year's Republican Iowa caucuses.

When he eventually registered his first reaction at a town hall meeting in Sheldon, Cruz blasted the court for its "unadulterated judicial activism," just as many other 2016 candidates did. That was ordinary.

But Cruz went further, saying there was disconnect between what Republicans in Washington were saying in their press releases and what they truly believed. Several GOP candidates, including Jeb Bush and Lindsey Graham, issued tightly-parsed language urging their colleagues to focus on protecting "religious freedom," while Ohio Gov. John Kasich urged Republicans to respect the ruling and ditch the matter altogether. Mike Huckabee and Bobby Jindal were a bit stronger, with the former Arkansas governor calling for Americans to "reject judicial tyranny, not retreat."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Cruz was skeptical that his opponents were committed to stopping same-sex nuptials.

"As much as there were crocodile tears shed in Washington yesterday on Obamacare, there were even bigger crocodile tears shed in Washington today on marriage," Cruz said.

That is a contrast Cruz made sure to highlight to nearly every voter he met in the Hawkeye State. The script at Dutch Bakery here was workmanlike: Shake the hand. Share outrage at the decision. Ridicule Republicans' public statements. Blast them for "popping champagne." Shake a new hand.

In those statements, some of Cruz's competitors, like Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, did call for a constitutional amendment to protect so-called traditional marriage. Cruz has introduced this amendment in the past, but again, he went a step further, strongly implying that he would support a constitutional convention to propose new amendments, a course of action never before pursued though it is explicitly outlined in Article V of the Constitution.

"I fully expect the drive for an Article V convention to get new energy and new steam," Cruz said in Sheldon when a voter asked whether he would back it.

By the end of the day, Cruz was bringing it up himself -- though always stopping just short of saying he would support the call for a convention. In a column posted on the National Review's website late Friday, Cruz was not only floating the convention idea but proposing his own amendment: judicial retention elections every eight years for Supreme Court justices.

"When they violate the constitutional amendment and the law, the American people can remove them," Cruz said to his loudest applause of the evening in Pierson. "We are not governed by a judicial priesthood. We are not governed by judicial tyranny."

But Cruz reserved his toughest talk for the head of that tyranny: Roberts, a justice who dissented with the Court's decision on Friday but who the day before voted with the Court's liberal wing to uphold Obamacare subsidies.

"His decision yesterday and his decision a couple of years ago violated his oath of office," Cruz said. "He knows full well that he's changing the law and not following it."

In northwest Iowa, Cruz calls court rulings 'lawless' // Des Moines Register // Matthew Patane – June 27, 2015

PIERSON, Ia. – Two Supreme Court decisions in as many days have made 2016 an even more bitter fight for conservatives, Republican presidential hopeful Ted Cruz said Friday.

Making three stops in northwest Iowa, Cruz railed against the court's justices for what he called "naked and unadulterated judicial activism" in a 5-4 ruling Friday that said same-sex marriages can take place in all 50 states.

"Religious liberty has never been so threatened as it is today," Cruz said in Sheldon. "I'll tell you, today's lawless decision from the Supreme Court puts religious liberty front and center in the target of the federal government."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The U.S. senator from Texas also criticized some of his colleagues for their responses to the same-sex marriage decision, saying they issued "condemning statements, but were quietly thrilled, relieved, celebrating and popping champagne because they're afraid to defend marriage."

"They don't want to have to talk about it anymore. Several 2016 candidates today put out statements saying 'The matter is decided, it's the law of the land, it's time to move on,' " Cruz told a crowd in Pierson. "We are in a very strange place when Republican presidential candidates are echoing Barack Obama's talking points."

U.S. Rep. Steve King, R-Iowa, also condemned the Supreme Court's ruling.

"Not one civilization in history has endorsed same-sex marriage, and they believe somehow the ratifiers of the 14th Amendment or the Constitution wrote it in in 1868," King told reporters. "I guarantee you, they weren't writing same-sex marriage into the Constitution in 1868."

He said Congress could enact retribution on the court, such as cutting its administrative budget.

"We can eliminate some of their staff to let them know that they have overreached and they don't need all of that help to do the damage they have done to the Constitution," said King, who attended the same event in Pierson as Cruz.

The Supreme Court also overstepped its bounds, Cruz said, by upholding a key provision of the federal health care law, more commonly known as Obamacare.

"Well, I'll tell you one consequence of yesterday's decision: It has made the 2016 election a referendum on repealing Obamacare," said Cruz, who has campaigned around the full repeal of the health care law.

Bill Tentinger, an independent pork producer from Le Mars, spoke with Cruz briefly during the candidate's Pierson stop.

Tentinger said Cruz appeard "down-to-earth," but it's too early for him to back a candidate.

"I'd be looking for a candidate that'd be interested in understanding the ramifications of increased regulations. ... I think we've got way too much of this stuff that is happening, regulations that are coming, without any forethought of what it's going to do to the economy," Tentinger said.

Following his speech in Sheldon, Cruz made retail politics-style stops in Orange City, interacting with Iowans while visiting three area businesses and a cultural center.

Delores DeJohn, 75, was one of the first to speak to Cruz as he entered a Dutch bakery off the city's main strip. DeJohn said she liked Cruz because "we need to have someone with strong values."

"I believe God is in control of it all, and we need god-fearing men in (the White House), otherwise this country will keep going down the other way," said DeJohn, who is retired.

AT THE EVENT

SETTING: In Sheldon, a meeting room at the Sheldon Community Services Center. In Orange City, three local business and a cultural center. In Pierson, a picnic, a baseball diamond and a city park. Organizers served pork and a band played country and rock music.

CROWD: About 57 people in Sheldon. Cruz's Orange City stop saw the largest crowd with about 12 people in a local bakery. About 130 people came to a picnic in Pierson to see Cruz, King and State Sen. Bill Anderson, R-Pierson, speak.

REACTION: A receptive audience in Sheldon, where Cruz received multiple applause lines and laughter. Quiet conversations in Orange City. A standing ovation in Pierson.

WHAT'S NEXT: Cruz will give a speech at Drake University in Des Moines on Saturday, followed by a "Main Street walk" in Pella.

GRAHAM

In Lindsey Graham's hometown, resentment over the Confederate flag // Politico // Ben Schreckinger – June 27, 2015

CENTRAL, S.C. — Sen. Lindsey Graham's home lies across the state from the city where nine African-Americans were gunned down in the basement of their church and the arena-turned-sanctuary where 5,500 mourners gathered Friday to honor a slain pastor.

Here in the town where Graham grew up, there are still billiard tables in the basement of the building where his family once lived in a back room and ran a pool hall, a liquor store and bar. For much of Graham's childhood, sitting inside the bar was a privilege reserved for whites. Today, the proprietor is a Puerto Rican woman from the Bronx.

Graham, in a short autobiography written as a preface to his presidential run, takes a small share of credit for racial progress in a part of the South where change never came quickly. He recounts a moment when, as a high school student, he confronted his parents about the unwritten rule that black patrons had to drink outside.

"The next time a black customer came into the place," writes Graham in "My Story," "my mom opened a bottle of beer, set it down on the bar, and motioned for him to take a stool." That was in the early 1970s, years after the legal end of Jim Crow.

Last week, in the wake of the racially motivated massacre at Emanuel AME Church by a white man in Charleston, as calls mounted to take down the Confederate flag that flies in front of the South Carolina Statehouse, Graham stood up for the banner. "It works here," he said.

But on Monday afternoon, Graham stood quietly beside Gov. Nikki Haley as she called for the flag to come down.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Call it a cave-in or a flip-flop or an evolution. In Pickens and Oconee counties, where Graham was raised and remains today, the people know him — firsthand or otherwise — and like him. Some resent him for turning on the flag. Most understand it. On race and Confederate heritage, they express the same mix of stubborn defensiveness, empathy and resignation that Graham has. In that way, he represents the people here. But he certainly isn't leading them.

The battle standard still has its staunch defenders in Central. At the Wal-Mart on Calhoun Memorial Highway, Confederate memorabilia had already been cleared from the shelves on Friday, but the flag shone from the front license-plate holder of a Chevy pickup in the parking lot. The truck's owner, Rita Haney, 28, said she wasn't bowing to the flag's opponents. She's planning to fly a big one in her front yard, "just to piss them the f—- off."

She expressed dismay that the group now includes her state's senior senator. "My dad loved Lindsey Graham," Haney said. "He would roll over in his grave."

There were others in the diners and under the shade trees in and around the town whose support Graham has lost in the past week. "He went from being all right to a coward," said Stanley, a 60-year-old logger wearing a National Tractor Pullers Association hat in a booth at Paw's Diner in nearby Seneca, where Graham now lives.

At Margaret's, another diner on another highway 10 miles away, 71-year-old waitress Betty Smith sat in another booth, breaking from work to chat with friend Betty Whitmire. She said she was so disgusted with the state's leaders that she would stop voting, and that she couldn't abide Graham's change of course. "I don't care what they do with the flag, but when you stand up and lie like that ...," she said.

But Whitmire expressed a more common sentiment. She still liked Graham. He had known her older brother, Leon, and showed up to his funeral as a congressman 14 years ago. She said she understood Graham's decision to change course on the flag, even if she didn't wholeheartedly endorse it.

Most white people around Central maintained the flag had nothing to do with the massacre in Charleston, even if it had become the cause of more trouble than it was worth. They said it didn't stand for racism, even if the people who chose to display it (whom they described as "rednecks," though not for attribution) were doing it to be racist. They said the flag at the Statehouse belonged "in a museum," even if politicians' "knee-jerk reaction" to the massacre was the wrong way to put it there.

If this moment presented Graham with an opportunity to lead the people of his native Upstate South Carolina out of a tangled thicket of contradictory feelings about race and heritage, he didn't seize it. Instead, he only stayed out of change's way. As events overtook lingering loyalties to the flag, Graham told NBC News this week, "I am not going to be part of stopping the progress of my state."

That doesn't surprise people who knew Graham in his youth. In the senator's autobiography, he writes of himself as a child blessed with "the gift of gab," but others remember him as more reserved.

"Lindsey wasn't a popular kid. He wasn't outspoken. He was real quiet," said lifelong Central resident Jimmy Head, 63, sitting in the shade of a tree with his father, John, 83, outside the family home.

Jimmy Head grew up next door to Graham's babysitter and his first memories of the senator are of a 5-year-old toddling over to shoot marbles on the dirt in their backyard and staying to play by himself long after the other kids had moved on to other games.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Head's father, John, Central's fire chief for 40 years, said he doesn't believe the flag's removal will change much or satisfy anybody. "That flag didn't shoot them people," he said. "To me, they agreed to take it off the [Statehouse] 15 years ago. You put it in a museum, in 15 years they'll go and try to close down that museum. There ain't no end."

Back then, protesters led by the NAACP demanded the removal of the flag from the dome of the South Carolina Statehouse, where it had flown since the 1960s. In the resulting compromise, the flag was moved to a Confederate war memorial in front of the Statehouse, where it remains today.

At the time, Graham, still in the House, stood with the people in his district who felt a sentimental attachment to the flag.

"There is a guy out there named Bubba," he said. "He grew up when public schools got integrated. He goes to work every day. There are women and African-Americans in the workplace and he's fine with that, but he thinks the whole world is against him and has rights he doesn't have. He thinks the flag is the last thing he has going for him and he's not going to take it down. I don't want to step on Bubba's feelings. There are no groups sticking up for the Bubbas of the world."

Graham's newfound support for the flag's removal doesn't change John Head's approval of him. "He has a good attitude. I would think he would have a good opportunity to win the race. He's well-knowledgeable," said Head, who last ran into Graham at the Waffle House in neighboring Clemson, home of the university, on the Sunday before the Charleston shooting.

Al Cumbie, a former mayor of Central five years Graham's senior, first knew the senator when he was a "little bitty thing." He, too, recalls a "quiet" kid, though a loving one who took it upon himself to raise his teenage sister Darline when both of their parents died during his college years and Graham was struggling to pay Cumbie, also the town's undertaker, for their funerals.

Smiley Garvin, 52, the owner of Uptown Barbers on the town's main, and only, drag, said black people in Central look fondly on the Grahams. They were poorer than the town's whites, but Lindsey's father was good about extending them credit at his liquor store, and when Lindsey closed the store down after his father's death, they still remember that he forgave the debts of people who had racked up tabs.

"I'm proud that he made the decision that he made," Garvin said of Graham's new stance, but he said South Carolina faces more pressing issues. "They could be spending time on something more beneficial than fussing over a flag. Like minimum wages. They should be fussing over that."

After 20 years in Washington, Graham hasn't strayed far from his roots here, said Cumbie. "You can see him in a Waffle House in blue jeans and a hat. You wouldn't necessarily know that he's a politician if you saw him out by himself."

That endears him to people in South Carolina's northwest corner. "He doesn't take being a senator as something of power. He's a pretty down-to-earth guy," he said.

In other words, he's not one to get way out ahead of his constituents. "I think he tries his best to be a statesman," said Cumbie.

But in Charleston, at the funeral on Friday for the Rev. Clementa Pinckney, one of the shooting victims and a former state senator, it was Gov. Nikki Haley who was praised because she was "bold enough to declare, 'Take it down.'" It was Charleston Mayor Joseph Riley whom President Barack Obama praised for "good and wise leadership." Graham was acknowledged for his presence, to light applause.

Back in Paw's Diner in Seneca, the late lunch stragglers paid little attention to the images of the funeral beamed by Fox News to the television behind the counter. For those caught up in the culture war, the Supreme Court's decisions on Obamacare and gay marriage offered fresher ammunition. Most people, though, said they were none too eager to linger on issues of race and heritage, and happy to move on.

Bill Wright, 67, gave Graham's role in the drama of the past two weeks a shrug. "He's a politician," said Wright, between bites of fried fish and cornbread. "That's basically the size of it."

Lindsey Graham's Unique Way Of Handling A Voter's Racist Comments // Buzzfeed // Rosie Grey – June 27, 2015

TAMA, Iowa — Lindsey Graham was in the full swing of his pitch to a group of potential voters gathered at a VFW hall in this small town an hour outside Des Moines on Saturday when, while he was talking about his relatively liberal stance on immigration, there came an unwelcome interruption.

"Towel heads," grumbled a man sitting at the bar, sporting a denim shirt with the arms cut off. "Sand ns."

Graham did what every candidate must in the age of smartphones and opposition trackers following a candidate anywhere he or she goes.

"I totally dissociate myself from this guy," Graham said. "What I would say is that what he said is not who I am. I'm not running to be president to please this guy." He then moved on and continued on taking questions from the other attendees.

At this early stage, running for president can be a weird thing — especially in these tiny, intimate gatherings where people are able to to speak their minds. In an earlier era, maybe before a woman once notoriously insisted to John McCain that Barack Obama was an Arab, Graham could probably have gotten away with ignoring the man; today, he had to act.

But Graham is also a long-shot candidate without much to lose, and his response ended up being different from the kind of tight-lipped, efficient shutdown one could imagine coming from someone for whom the stakes are higher. A few minutes after the exchange, Graham concluded his spiel to the 15 or so people assembled in the dark, low-ceilinged room by drawing a comparison between his own hardscrabble upbringing in a bar in small town South Carolina and people like the man who had issued the slurs.

"I'm tired of telling people things they want to hear that I don't believe. I changed a long time ago as a politician. I was scared to death of going into a room to be disagreed with. I don't feel that way anymore. I feel free. I feel able to tell you exactly what I believe and why I believe it," Graham said.

"Put me on your list of people to consider, talk to a neighbor, and if you can support me, bring somebody to the caucus — that's the only way I'm going to make it, is to have people like you buy into what I'm trying to do," he said. "I grew up in a place just like this. This guy at the bar, I grew up with people just like him."

Graham then took it a step further: The event had been billed as "Politics and Pool," and he wanted to play pool with someone.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There was silence.

Finally, a couple guys suggested the very man who had offered the slurs — the one Graham himself had called out, twice. The man agreed to play, Graham shook his hand, and the men played pool. Graham won.

On the way out, BuzzFeed News asked Graham why he had played pool with the man.

“Because he was the only one that would play,” Graham said. “And I wanted to beat him. I was going to beat him if it’s the last thing I did in Iowa.”

SANTORUM

Santorum denounces marriage ruling as Supreme Court decision dominates conservative gathering / / AP // Kristen Wyatt – June 27, 2015

DENVER — Republican presidential hopeful Rick Santorum denounced the landmark same-sex marriage ruling Friday in a fiery speech to about 4,000 conservatives gathered in Denver.

The former Pennsylvania senator told the Western Conservative Summit that the Supreme Court’s decision making same-sex marriage the law of the land is “based on a lie.”

“We have a Supreme Court that says the only reason that you could possibly oppose changing marriage laws in America is because you hate people who want to marry people of the same sex. That is not true,” Santorum said. “It’s a decision based on a lie. Based on fundamental untruths.”

Santorum said he predicted a decade ago that gay marriage would be law nationwide without an amendment to the U.S. Constitution. He stopped short of calling for a fresh effort to amend the Cponstitution, but he said the nation needs to “heal” from the decision.

“My heart aches tonight. My heart aches tonight because that family unit has further been assaulted,” Santorum said.

The crowd applauded Santorum’s remarks and gave him a standing ovation. Santorum won Colorado’s GOP presidential caucuses in 2012 and 2008.

Santorum is one of six presidential hopefuls in Denver this weekend addressing the Western Conservative Summit.

Colorado’s presidential preference primaries are nonbinding and play little role in either party. But Colorado is a key battleground state in general elections, and presidential candidates frequently test campaign themes here.

Addressing the conference Saturday are Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry. Rounding out the slate are businesswoman Carly Fiorina, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and neurosurgeon Ben Carson.

Republican Sen. Rand Paul is visiting Colorado next week.

Outside Santorum's remarks Friday, the Colorado Log Cabin Republicans manned a free booth given to them by the state party.

The gay Republican group sought to buy a booth from the Western Conservative Summit, organized by Colorado Christian University. The school denied their request, prompting the state party to invite them to share their booth.

"We really are part of the Republican Party, and we want to be part of the conversation," said Log Cabin Republicans member Jeff Bjorlin.

Santorum Leads Off Speakers At Western Conservative Summit // AP – June 27, 2015

Five Republican presidential hopefuls are in Denver Saturday talking to a group of conservative activists.

The Western Conservative Summit is a gathering of about 4,000 conservatives. The crowd heard Friday speeches from tea party activists and GOP presidential candidate Rick Santorum.

So far the gathering has concentrated on last week's Supreme Court rulings and what they mean for the GOP. The Court last week upheld President Obama's health care overhaul and made gay marriage legal in all 50 states.

Santorum, who won Colorado's GOP presidential caucuses in 2012 and 2008, said the gay marriage ruling was "based on a lie" that gay-marriage opponents are motivated by discrimination.

He's is one of seven presidential hopefuls in Denver this weekend addressing the Western Conservative Summit. Also attending the conference are Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry. Rounding out the slate are businesswoman Carly Fiorina, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and neurosurgeon Ben Carson.

In addition to Walker, the crowd is hearing Saturday speeches from GOP presidential hopefuls Ben Carson, Carly Fiorina, Mike Huckabee and Rick Perry.

Rick Santorum: Justice Kennedy Is "Potentially Disrupting The Foundation Of The World." // Buzzfeed News // Andrew Kaczynski – June 27, 2015

Former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum says the Supreme Court decision on Friday ruling bans on same-sex marriage are unconstitutional is "potentially disrupting the foundation of the world."

Santorum, who is running for the Republican presidential nomination, said he wasn't surprised at the ruling, citing the previous ruling from the court striking down the Defense of Marriage of Act. He called Friday a "very sad day."

"Justice Kennedy said — this is remarkable but listen to it — the only reason that any could oppose gay marriage is because they hated gays and lesbians. Which is almost stops you in your tracks," Santorum said.

"That five thousand years of human history, a biblically-given thing that God somehow gave us marriage as a man and woman, that that was, that somehow that was intrinsically about hating other people. Which is very, very sad to see how the culture's changed and how this one man, this is it, this one man, this one man, a 5-4 decision is going to try to affect the basic foundation of America, and frankly, now, with America leading the way, potentially disrupting the foundation of the world."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Santorum said the next thing to do after the court ruling was to fight to be able "to even to talk about it," because people will try to "silence any disagreement." He said it was not time "to move on," because then they would lose ground in arguing for religious liberty.

"There's no slippery slope here," the former Pennsylvania senator added, "religious liberty is under assault today, not going to be, it is, and it's going to be even more so as we say with this decision."

"Now that this is the law of the land," he said. "The question is going to be whether we are going to allow people to actually dissent on this or whether if they are going to be treated as the proponents of this position have advocated: this is a civil rights position and if you oppose this you're the equivalent a racist back in the 50s and 60s."

Santorum suggest churches and others who dissent could lose the privileges of tax benefits.

HUCKABEE

Huckabee, Other GOP Hopefuls Slam Gay Marriage Ruling // AP – June 28, 2015

DENVER — Republican presidential candidate Mike Huckabee told conservatives Saturday that the Supreme Court tried to "unwrite the laws of nature and the laws of nature's God" when it legalized gay marriage across the nation.

The former Arkansas governor suggested that people in the United States flout the ruling, as President Abraham Lincoln did in the wake of the justices' 1857 decision that blacks could not be citizens. Huckabee also pointed out that President Barack Obama opposed gay marriage until 2012.

"He was either lying in 2008, or he's lying now, or God has rewritten the Bible and only Barack Obama has gotten the new edition," Huckabee told the crowd at the Western Conservative Summit.

Huckabee was among the GOP presidential hopefuls at the gathering, which followed a week in which the high court also upheld Obama's signature health care law. The Republicans offered few suggestions on what to do about the gay marriage ruling, highlighting the party's challenges on social issues ahead of the 2016 elections.

Joining Huckabee at the conference was Republican hopeful Carly Fiorina, who said she supports civil unions. She said opponents of the ruling should now focus efforts on religious freedom in public accommodations, such as cases of bakers facing penalties for refusing to serve gay couples.

Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry derided the ruling but didn't suggest a next step.

"These decisions need to be made in the states," said Perry, who noted that his states' rights plank extends even to Colorado legalizing recreational marijuana in defiance of federal drug law.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I defend the right of Colorado to be wrong on that issue," Perry said. The crowd chuckled.

Scheduled to conclude the gathering Saturday was Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who has called for a constitutional amendment to undo the marriage ruling.

On Friday, former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum said the gay marriage ruling was "based on a lie" that gay-marriage opponents are motivated by discrimination.

"We have a Supreme Court that says the only reason that you could possibly oppose changing marriage laws in America is because you hate people who want to marry people of the same sex. That is not true," Santorum said.

Mike Huckabee: Conservatives can ignore gay marriage ruling like Lincoln ignored Dred Scott // The Washington Times // Valerie Richardson – June 27, 2015

DENVER — Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee suggested Saturday that conservatives treat the Supreme Court's gay marriage decision like Abraham Lincoln treated the high court's pro-slavery ruling in Dred Scott: Ignore it.

"They can do same thing that Abraham Lincoln did about the Dred Scott decision of 1857," Mr. Huckabee said at the Western Conservative Summit. "The Dred Scott decision said that African-Americans were not fully human, that they need not be treated as fully human."

"He [Lincoln] simply ignored the ruling and said, 'That's not correct,' " Mr. Huckabee said. "And by the way, it may sound like, 'Oh, that's an extreme position.' Actually, it's a constitutional position. Here's why: If we acquiesce immediately without review, without the other branches of government, it goes back to my point, that this is judicial tyranny."

He also said he wanted to warn his liberal friends — "both of them," he joked — that an activist court can swing the other way.

When that happens, "I hope they remember their jubilation," Mr. Huckabee said.

The Republican presidential hopeful and former Fox News host took a jab at President Obama for reversing his past opposition to same-sex marriage.

"If he has so radically changed his view and now he believes that same-sex marriage is the best thing that could happen to this country, one of three things is true: He was either lying in 2008, he's lying now, or God rewrote the Bible and Barack Obama is the only one who got the new edition," Mr. Huckabee said to applause and laughter.

Mr. Huckabee is one of six would-be GOP presidential nominees scheduled to speak at the three-day conference hosted by the Centennial Institute at the Colorado Convention Center.

Huckabee: Supreme Court is an 'extreme court' // The Hill // Martin Matishak – June 27, 2015

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (R) on Saturday skewered the Supreme Court for ruling to legalize same-sex marriage and preserve Obamacare, saying the decisions could lead to "judicial tyranny."

"Over the last couple of days, our country has seen two of the most blatant, disturbing, disgusting examples of judicial activism in the history of these United States," the 2016 presidential candidate said in a speech during the second day of the Western Conservative Summit in Denver.

"We don't have a Supreme Court, we have an extreme court," he added. "We have a court that think it's not just the Supreme Court, they thinks they are the supreme branch" of government.

"They are not the supreme branch and they are most certainly not the supreme being that can unwrite the laws of nature and the laws of nature's god, which is exactly what they've attempted to do this week," according to Huckabee.

He urged the audience not to "bow and worship at the alter of judicial supremacy."

Huckabee said letting the court overrule the two other branches of government and election decisions opens the door to "something very dangerous to our way of life and our great republic: Judicial tyranny where the people no longer rule, five unelected black-robed lawyers rule."

He said the decision should be up to local and state governments and suggested conservatives simply ignore the ruling, likening it to President Lincoln's choice not to respect the court's Dred Scott decision regarding slavery.

Without review by the legislative and executive branches, the court essentially chose to "reach out into thin air and created a law," according to Huckabee.

He also warned liberals who have celebrated the decision, including the Obama administration, which lit up the White House Friday night with gay-pride colors, to "remember their jubilation" because "someday there may be a conservative court" that reverses the decision.

FIORINA

Carly Fiorina on Obamacare: Rich getting richer, while middle-class getting squeezed // The Washington Times // Valerie Richardson – June 27, 2015

DENVER — Obamacare is fueling "crony capitalism" by driving out small providers and ensuring that only the largest insurance companies and hospitals can survive, says Republican presidential contender Carly Fiorina.

The former CEO of Hewlett-Packard, Ms. Fiorina said Saturday that the Affordable Care Act has made the tax and regulatory codes so complicated that only the biggest, richest businesses can afford to grapple with the details.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Why does Obamacare have to be repealed?" said Ms. Fiorina at the Western Conservative Summit. "Not just because it's failing by every measure — emergency room visits are up over 20 percent, insurance premiums are up over 35 percent, we're dumping people into Medicaid, there aren't enough doctors in Medicaid any more — we're not serving people."

The ACA "is so many thousands of pages, literally tens of thousands of pages, that what do you see happening right now? Insurance companies consolidating. Big merger announced last week. Hospitals consolidating. Drug companies consolidating. The big are getting bigger to handle big government. That's what's happening," she said.

The result is that "the wealthy are getting wealthier," and "the small, the powerless, the start-ups are getting crushed," Ms. Fiorina said.

"Crony capitalism is alive and well now, and the reason for that is when you have big complicated government, only the big, the powerful, the wealthy, the well-connected can deal with it," she said.

Ms. Fiorina spoke and signed copies of her recently released book, "Rising to the Challenge: My Leadership Journey," at the summit, which runs through Sunday at the Colorado Convention Center.

Fiorina: Marriage is 'grounded in spirituality' // The Hill // Mark Hensch – June 27, 2015

GOP presidential candidate Carly Fiorina on Saturday said the Supreme Court's legalization of same-sex marriage nationwide ignores religious history across most world faiths.

The former Hewlett-Packard CEO argued history has almost always defined marriage as the coupling of one man with one woman on spiritual grounds.

"Marriage is an institution grounded in spirituality," she told listeners at the Western Conservative Summit 2015 in Denver.

"For millennia, through every religion in the world, marriage has meant a very specific thing," Fiorina said.

"That is very different from five Supreme Court justices saying, 'We're going to tell you what marriage is,' " she added.

The Supreme Court ruled in a landmark 5-4 decision Friday that all states must recognize same-sex marriages under the 14th Amendment's equal protection clause.

Fiorina said Saturday their decision stole an opportunity from Americans to organically decide the issue themselves.

"We saw over the last couple days an incredible example of judicial overreach," she said of the Supreme Court's multiple rulings earlier this week.

"We saw an example of people giving in to politics and giving up on principles," she said, criticizing the Supreme Court as "activist judges."

"I am sorry the Supreme Court took up this case," Fiorina added. "I think it was best left up to the states and the people to continue this discussion."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fiorina said her reaction to Obergefell v. Hodges' decision did not mean she opposes same-sex relationships.

She argued a better balance is possible between gay and religious rights.

"I have always been supportive of civil unions," she said, citing moves made during her tenure at Hewlett-Packard.

"I don't think government should discriminate in the provision of benefits."

The ex-technology executive argued Republicans should practice greater inclusiveness towards potential voters.

Fiorina said any inability to connect with Americans could cost her party the presidential election in 2016.

"We have to talk to everyone," she said. "Our tone matters. Our language matters."

"We cannot be judgmental, we have to be empathetic," Fiorina added.

Fiorina argued that as president, she would help Americans realize their shared capability for achieving great things.

"Here, in this nation, every individual has the right to fulfill their potential," she said.

"Our Founders knew that everybody has God-given gifts," Fiorina added. "That right comes from God and cannot be taken away by man or government."

Carly Fiorina fired up conservatives at Western Summit // The Gazette // Megan Schrader – June 27, 2015

The former CEO of the technology giant Hewlett-Packard wowed a crowd at the Western Conservative Summit in Denver Saturday with her pitch for president.

Her fire and brimstone preaching of a keep-it-simple-stupid approach to governing had the crowd on its feet.

Carly Fiorina hit foreign policy hard in her short speech at the Denver Convention Center.

"The truth is I know more world leaders on the stage today than anyone else running with the possible exception of Hillary Clinton, only I didn't do photo ops," Fiorina said. "I had a private meeting with Vladimir Putin, a private meeting with Bibi Netanyahu a private meeting with the king of Jordan, a private meeting with the leaders of Saudi Arabia, South Africa, China, Brazil."

Fiorina said on her first day in office she'd call Benjamin (Bibi) Netanyahu and show the world what a true ally the United States is. The crowd erupted.

She said she'd draw a hard line in the sand for Iran - the new deal would be access to all nuclear facilities or face crippling economic sanctions.

"Ladies and gentlemen we can defeat ISIS our allies will help us but we must lead," she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fiorina was one of the most talked about speakers at the conference. Coming from a non-political background (like presidential hopeful Ben Carson who will speak tonight) Fiorina has the draw of the unknown.

Bob Beauprez, the unsuccessful Republican nominee for governor in 2014, said "Carly just knocked it out of the park."

"She's a remarkable talent," Beauprez said, adding that there are a whole list of steller conservatives running this year and it'll be a hard decision.

TRUMP

Hispanic leaders urge NBC to cut ties to Donald Trump // CNN // Brian Stelter – June 27, 2015

In a statement on Saturday, the National Hispanic Leadership Agenda simultaneously applauded Univision's decision to sever ties with Trump and urged NBC to "follow Univision's lead."

Members of the coalition, NHLA for short, include business, media, and cultural advocacy groups like the National Council of La Raza, the United States Hispanic Chamber of Commerce, Presente.org and the National Hispanic Media Coalition.

It called on NBCUniversal to "withdraw from airing the Miss USA pageant and terminate its financial ties to Donald Trump."

Univision similarly canceled its airing of Miss USA, slated for July 12, in the wake of Trump's offensive remarks about Mexican immigrants. Trump, now a presidential candidate, has called Mexicans "rapists" and "killers," among other things.

Univision's decision was announced on Thursday. The network had a long-term contract with Trump to televise Miss USA and Miss Universe, and Trump has threatened to sue over the breach of contract.

NBC's ties with Trump have since come under scrutiny. NBCUniversal owns half of the pageant business while Trump owns the rest. So NBC is not just a broadcaster of Miss USA, it's a business partner of The Trump Organization.

CNNMoney reported on Friday that NBC is reviewing its contracts with Trump. For now the network has distanced itself from the candidate's offensive comments but said nothing about the business venture or the upcoming broadcast.

One of the coalition members, Felix Sanchez, chairman of the National Hispanic Foundation for the Arts, said Univision's decision "is civil rights leadership in the digital age."

He said, "We implore NBCU to follow Univision's lead and take a similar stance and sever their financial relationship with Mr. Trump, in light of the bigoted way he has denigrated Mexicans and Mexican-Americans."

Donald Trump Pushes Forward in Iowa Despite Republican Party Concern // ABC News // Benjamin Siegel – June 27, 2015

Donald Trump attended two events in Iowa Saturday, continuing his campaign push in the state despite drawing concern from the Republican party over his recent comments about Mexican immigrants.

The real estate mogul appeared at a reception at the John Wayne Birthplace and Museum ahead of headlining the Madison County GOP Dinner.

Republican National Committee Chair Reince Priebus admits that Trump's comments were "not helpful to the party." But the party won't condemn the presidential candidate or ban him from the first primary debate due to his comments, Priebus said.

"We're going to run a fair, clean primary system, which includes a debate process that's up front and clear to people," Priebus said Friday regarding Trump. "Whichever candidates make that process cutoff, those people are going to be on the stage."

Trump said Mexican immigrants were bringing "drugs," "crime" and "rapists" to the U.S. when announcing his candidacy earlier this month.

"Not everything is going to be a hundred percent copacetic all the time," said Priebus, who commissioned a report after the 2012 election that determined the Republican party needed to improve its outreach to Hispanic voter. "But again, it's not my decision to decide who the nominee is and who we're going to support."

Trump, 69, is among the top 10 Republican presidential candidates in a number of recent polls, which puts him on pace to qualify for the first two Republican primary debates in the presidential cycle later this year.

Many party members are concerned the business mogul, who has not been afraid to criticize fellow Republicans as a candidate, would serve as a distraction in the primary process.

Spanish language television network Univison ended its Miss Universe pageant relationship with Trump's business interests after his immigrant comments. He has since banned the company and its leaders from using his hotel and golf course in Doral, Florida.

Donald Trump is even more of a monster than you think: Why his golf courses are environmental disasters // Salon // Lindsay Abrams – June 27, 2015

Here in the United States, Donald Trump gets a lot of flak for the many, many things you can hardly believe he said: claiming that a cold day disproves the reality of global warming, for example, or, more recently, declaring that most Mexican immigrants are "rapists."

Trump's no less loathed in Scotland. There, however, the problem is less about what Trump says, and more about what he's actually done — run roughshod over protected dunes to build an elite golf course, attack an offshore wind energy project because it "ruined" his view, cajole politicians into supporting his every whim. He's also run into trouble for the promises he's failed to keep — when the deal ultimately went sour, he flew off in his private jet, leaving behind none of the economic prosperity he'd sworn the project would create. His fate as one of the country's top villains was sealed with Anthony Baxter's 2011 documentary, "You've Been Trumped," which documented a saga so egregious it inspired a folk song, and made such waves that Trump finally agreed to sit down with Baxter on camera.

That interview could be read as the climax of Baxter's newest documentary, "A Dangerous Game," which picks up where the last left off. But Trump knows how to hold his own against angry activists — or, at least, he knows how to deflect their questions. With no evidence to back himself up, he explains at one point that he himself is a "great environmentalist." The film's more alarming revelation is that it's not just Trump: elitist billionaires, in Baxter's telling, have co-opted golf, creating vast artificial environments for play that strain local resources and shut out all but the wealthy, and which all too often subvert democracy. This plays out as tragedy in Dubrovnik, Croatia — a World Heritage Site — where residents' efforts to keep out a golf resort result in the passing of a local referendum with an 84 percent majority, only to see the project green-lighted anyway.

Salon spoke with Baxter about the golf industry's need to embrace a more sustainable model, and about his continued pursuit of America's would-be 45th president. This interview has been lightly edited for clarity.

To start, it would be great to hear about how you went from this one local Donald Trump story, and then branched out into this larger problem of elite golf courses.

It was through taking it to communities that really led me to make this film, because people kept saying to me at screenings around the world that they were having the same type of thing happening to them in their communities. It's not always Donald Trump, but it's people like him. That was really the journey I set out on.

I also wanted to focus in on the ludicrous situation of these golf courses being built in places like the California desert, for example, which has experienced the worst drought in history. And when you consider that the average golf course uses 312,000 gallons of water per day, and the average American family of four uses 400 gallons/day, it really is shocking, the scale of this stuff. I wanted to explore how our planet cannot afford these gated, super-luxury resorts for very wealthy people like Donald Trump, yet they keep being built in places that are so unsustainable.

Donald Trump recently announced plans to build a new golf course designed by Tiger Woods in Dubai, and it's just crazy. I don't think anybody could make a case as to why, environmentally, that is a sound idea. They're so vulnerable as well to an economic downturn, as we've seen: the first golf course of Tiger Woods' design of the desert in Dubai has now been reclaimed by the desert because the whole plan went belly up.

So yes, it was a case of wanting to explore that, but also to continue to tell the story of what was happening in Scotland, because, despite having had the first film on the BBC, where there is a real backlash against Donald Trump, his organization, and the way they had treated those local people, I was so shocked to find that that treatment was continuing, even after that. So 90 year-old Molly Forbes still didn't have a proper working water supply several years after Donald Trump's work was cut off while building the golf course, and there were still mounds of earth being built next to the residents' homes and Donald Trump was telling the media that he was treating them well. I think that those things were really the powerful driver to want to continue to follow the story.

You really have a clear-cut villain in this one of Trump. I keep thinking back to that image of Molly carrying the water up from her well to wash her dishes ...

Yes, I think the problem with Donald Trump, and the reason these late-night chat shows have so much fun with him, are the inflammatory things he says. Just take his comments about Mexico sending rapists and drugs dealers and crime into the U.S., and his big idea to build a Berlin Wall-style barrier between the two countries. That, of course, allows people to have a laugh about those ridiculous ideas, but the point is, as we show in the film, that it's not just what he says that is bad and dangerous, but it's what he does.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In Scotland, he claimed that he was going to be creating 6,000 jobs, and he invested one and a half billion dollars into what he claimed was going to be the greatest golf course in the world. Now, that was 10 years ago, and to date we have one golf course built, we have less than 200 jobs created, we have tens of millions of dollars having been invested, and not the $1.5 billion — which was such a stupid number under any scrutiny. But the Scottish government believed his promises, and that's also part of the problem with this whole thing, because we look to our governments to protect us from these kinds of developments, and the Scottish government completely failed in this case to protect a site of special scientific interest, which was supposed to be protected for future generations to enjoy, and that's now been lost because of the golf course built there.

Donald Trump has now stabilized the dunes, he's nailed them down, so that they don't move and shift as nature intended. He's built a golf course, which is for wealthy people to play, and he had plans to build another one, which he pulled the plug on after the Scottish government won the battle against him over the wind farm which he took great umbrage over.

The things that he does that we document in the film are simply dangerous and worrying, and I hope as many people as possible in the United States can see the film. Even seeing those polling numbers Tuesday, where he's polling No. 2 in New Hampshire, you have to ask yourself: Do people really know what he does? They enjoy his entertainment value, maybe, but take a look at this film and you'll see what he actually does.

About those ridiculous things he says: As somebody who's confronted Donald Trump a few times, and then being finally able to sit and talk with him, did you get the impression that he kind of plays dumb as part of a strategy he uses for getting away with things?

Yes, well, he's used to inviting people up to the boardroom in Trump Towers for interviews, and the first question I'll ask is about his hair, which he obviously loves. But the point is, it's that kind of deflection that's the real problem. He'll make points to journalists that they'll just repeat as facts, and that's what's so concerning.

In the Scottish case, for example, he said he was going to be investing $1.5 billion and clearly wasn't. The thing is, he's such an expert at manipulating the media, and he also has access to the airwaves and the lawyers that ordinary people don't have; he just needs to jump onto Fox and Friends for anything he wants to say, and it'll just be believed. It's a very, very worrying situation. Yes, it's entertaining, but it's concerning that a man who thinks he stands a chance of becoming the next president of the United States could be making such ludicrous claims and saying such inflammatory things on prime-time television.

Donald Trump Presidential Campaign Dissected By Bill Maher And Panel // Deadline // Lisa de Moraes – June 27, 2015

Real estate mogul/reality TV Star/beauty pageant co-owner/GOP presidential candidate Trump is "the Frankenstein monster," created by the Tea Party, who isn't going away any time soon, Bill Maher pronounced last night on his HBO late night show Real Time. "He never apologizes – he's never wrong, no matter what crazy thing he says. He's the white Kanye," Maher added for good measure. "For a party whose base adores belligerence, this is The Guy."

Most recently, Trump's been in the news when Univision announced it would not broadcast the Miss USA Pageant, which his organization co-owns with NBC, owing to comments Trump made about Mexico in announcing his White House bid.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican pollster Kristen Soltis Anderson, joining Maher in his show's panel discussion, said the problem Trump is going to have is that he is viewed unfavorably by 3/4 of Republicans. Guess how long into the chat it took her to blame the media for Trump's current polling numbers?

"I indict the media on this one. Because any time Trump does anything looney he gets so, so much press. He holds a press [conference] to be The Birther In Chief, and everybody goes and watches," she scolded.

"He's the guy on The Bachelorette you don't want to see kicked off the show," chimed in panelist Judd Apatow.

Hispanic Group Pressures NBC to Dump Donald Trump // Hollywood Reporter // Ryan Gajewski – June 27, 2015

Spanish-language network Univision cut ties with the mogul's Miss Universe Organization on Thursday.

The National Hispanic Leadership Agenda issued a statement Saturday calling on NBC to cut ties to the Miss Universe Organization, which counts Donald Trump as a part-owner.

The National Hispanic Leadership Agenda issued a statement Saturday calling on NBC to cut ties to the Miss Universe Organization, which counts Donald Trump as a part-owner.

The coalition of 39 different Latino advocacy groups praised Univision for ending its Miss Universe deal Thursday following Trump's disparaging remarks about Mexican-Americans. In his speech earlier this month announcing his presidential campaign, Trump said that immigrants from Mexico are "bringing crime" and are "rapists."

"Aspirants to the highest office in the land must not use a national electoral platform to spew venomous speech about Mexican immigrants and Mexican-Americans," said NHLA chair and Labor Council for Latin American Advancement executive director Hector Sanchez. "As a Mexican immigrant to this country, I can personally attest to the falsity of Donald Trump's statements."

Felix Sanchez, chairman and co-founder of the National Hispanic Foundation for the Arts, said: "Univision Communications' courageous action to sever ties with both the Miss USA and Miss Universe Pageants — which are partly owned by Donald Trump — is civil rights leadership in the digital age. We implore NBCU to follow Univision's lead and take a similar stance and sever their financial relationship with Mr. Trump, in light of the bigoted way he has denigrated Mexicans and Mexican-Americans."

In a letter directed at Univision president Randy Falco on Friday, Trump responded to Univision ending its deal by stating that Univision's employees and representatives are not to step foot on Trump National Doral property.

The Miss Universe pageant is set to air July 12 on NBC.

Scott Walker gives shout-out to Colorado Springs during Denver speech // Gazette // Megan Shrader – June 27, 2015

DENVER - Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, an all-but-announced 2016 presidential candidate, shouted out to his birthplace - Colorado Springs - Saturday night before thousands at the Western Conservative Summit in Denver.

Walker, who headlined the three-day event, said his father was a preacher at a Baptist church in downtown Colorado Springs.

Senate President Bill Cadman, R-Colorado Springs, introduced Walker, touting Walker's ability to beat back an effort to recall him from office after sweeping employment reforms that some considered anti-union became law.

"They were trying to intimidate us. I'm proud to tell you tonight that we were not intimidated. We took the power out of the hands of big special interests," Walker said.

He said thousands of protestors arrived at his home, and that was the origination of the Occupy Wall Street movement.

"My apologies for starting that," he said.

"Our reforms not only changed unions in our state, we were able to change our economic status," he said, adding that unemployment levels dropped, labor participation rates rose and the economy recovered.

Walker was well received by all but one man in the crowd who interrupted his response to a question by yelling out in the darkened theater. The man asked Walker to talk about immigration and then continued yelling until police removed him.

Walker's speech capped a day of speeches in which several GOP presidential candidates ticked through their plans.

Earlier in the day, the even-tempered Ben Carson, with his subtle jokes and stabs, methodically laid out his complex plans for such things as overcoming the unfunded liability for Medicaid and Social Security and fixing the Affordable Care Act.

"The longer you allow it to grow the deeper the pain, the more difficult it will be to fix it," Carson said, noting that France had to cut benefits and raise the retirement age to bail out its benefits.

Carson, a retired renowned neurosurgeon whose rise from poverty story is the subject of a Cuba Gooding Jr. movie, has never held political office and is considered a long shot for the office.

"People say to me you're a doctor and you've had an illustrious career why would you sully that with politics, and I asked myself the same thing too," Carson said. He proposed a hiatus of corporate taxes to allow trillions in off-shore tax-sheltered dollars to come home with the stipulation that 10 percent must be used for job creation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When it comes to Obamacare, Carson envisions using Health Savings Accounts to the level that ordinary people can self-insure and then would only need to purchase insurance for catastrophes.

Carson won the straw poll in 2014 at the Western Conservative Summit and some said it was likely he would win again. Attendees of the conference were asked for their presidential pick and the results will be tallied Sunday.

Carly Fiorina, the former CEO of the technology-giant Hewlett-Packard, was one of the most anticipated speakers Saturday and she did not disappoint.

Carole Cruson, 72, of Golden came last year and returned to see Rick Santorum, the Pennsylvania Senator who is giving the White House a second shot, on Friday night.

She's particularly excited about Carly Fiorina, however.

"I just think she's the most well-spoken person I've heard," Cruson said. "She's an articulate woman with great poise."

Even Bob Beauprez, Colorado's retired congressman who ran for governor in 2014, was impressed with Fiorina, calling her a great talent.

Fiorina hit foreign policy hard in her short speech at the Denver Convention Center.

"The truth is I know more world leaders on the stage today than anyone else running with the possible exception of Hillary Clinton, only I didn't do photo ops," Fiorina said. "I had a private meeting with Vladimir Putin, a private meeting with Bibi Netanyahu, a private meeting with the king of Jordan, a private meeting with the leaders of Saudi Arabia, South Africa, China, Brazil."

Fiorina said on her first day in office she'd call Benjamin (Bibi) Netanyahu and show the world what a true ally the United States is. The crowd erupted.

Addressing her weak point, Fiorina said she did what she needed to do at HP and is proud of her record even though it included layoffs.

She said sometimes you have to make tough decisions to live to fight another day.

Long-time Texas Gov. Rick Perry brought on his southern drawl and charm for his animated stump speech Saturday afternoon. Perry ran down how the Texas economy flourished under his leadership.

"We believe that if you're free from overtaxation and overregulation, if you're free from over litigation, if you've got accountable public schools in place where you've got a skilled workforce, there is nothing you can't accomplish," Perry said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Perry ran in 2012 and lost in his primary pursuit. When asked why he was more animated Saturday than he had been four years ago, Perry said it's good to be healthy.

"There are already 13 or 14 in, so who knows how many are going to get into this thing. But any of you who are thinking about it, don't have major back surgery," Perry joked.

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee joked that he plans to raise more money this time around than in 2008 when he failed to win the GOP presidential ticket.

He laid out his plan to reform the tax plan, get rid of the IRS and move to a "fair tax." Instead of taxing income the nation should tax at the moment of consumption, he said.

"It no longer punishes people for their productivity and rewards them for their irresponsibility," Huckabee said. "I was raised with the idea that we ought to reward people who work, who save, who invest and who leave something behind for the next generation and yet our government, our current tax code punishes every one of those activities."

Former U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum mentioned a fair tax during his speech Friday night at the event sponsored by the Lakewood-based Colorado Christian University. It's the sixth annual "Rally on the Right" and arguably the biggest year. It concludes Sunday with the straw poll.

Scott Walker in Colorado to address conservative summit // Milwaukee Wisconsin Journal – Sentinel – June 27, 2015

Gov. Scott Walker is scheduled to speak Saturday night at the Western Conservative Summit in Denver.

At the event, Wisconsin's Republican governor and likely 2016 presidential candidate will be doing a question-and-answer session with conservative radio talk show host Hugh Hewitt.

Walker will be joined by other GOP presidential hopefuls, including former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, and Dr. Ben Carson.

The gathering brings together about 4,000 conservatives at the Colorado Convention Center in Denver.

It comes in the wake of a landmark U.S. Supreme Court ruling Friday that extended same-sex marriage rights nationwide.

Walker deemed the decision a "grave mistake," and called for amending the U.S. Constitution to allow states to ban gay marriage.

Walker plans to launch his bid for the presidency next month. He said earlier this week he plans to announce his plans the week of July 13, a date previously reported by Daniel Bice of the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel.

Much of the talk among conservatives in Denver so far has concentrated on that ruling, as well as another released Thursday upholding President Barack Obama's health care overhaul.

Chris Christie Sets Up Campaign Web Site Before Expected Presidential Run // WSJ // Heather Haddon – June 27, 2015

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie launched a presidential campaign website Saturday, another signal that he soon will enter the Republican primary race.

The website, www.chrischristie.com , includes Mr. Christie's slogan, "Telling it Like it Is," a phrase he's used in town-hall meetings he's held in recent weeks in early primary states.

Mr. Christie is been expected to hold an event Tuesday to mark his formal entry into the race. He would be the 14th major Republican in the primary field.

The new website states that it was paid for by Chris Christie for President Inc. Earlier, Mr. Christie had paid for political activities through a leadership political-action committee, Leadership Matters for America. He also has a super PAC, America Leads, that has been raising funds.

Once Mr. Christie officially announces a bid, the super PAC can't coordinate activities with his campaign.

The governor had said he would wait to announce his decision on a 2016 candidacy until after the state's budget was set. On Friday, Mr. Christie signed a $34 billion budget that vetoed tax increases and extended a credit to working families.

On Tuesday morning, Mr. Christie is set to "host a special announcement event at Livingston High School," his alma mater, according to a news release. He will then travel to New Hampshire for an event in which he will take unscripted questions from voters.

Mr. Christie is expected to hold campaign events in New Hampshire through Independence Day.

The governor got his start in politics in the suburban Livingston High School, where he was class president.

The public school is also the alma mater of David Wildstein, the former Port Authority of New York and New Jersey official and Christie aide who pleaded guilty in May to charges related to the George Washington Bridge lane closure scandal.

Mr. Christie was in the class behind Mr. Wildstein. He has distanced himself from his former ally since the lane closure scandal came to light last year.

Asked if there were concerns about using the same high school Mr. Wildstein attended for the presidential announcement, an aide to Mr. Christie said they weren't worried about it.

Chris Christie Unveils Presidential Campaign Website // Bloomberg // Elizabeth Titus – June 27, 2015

New Jersey Governor Chris Christie on Saturday unveiled a presidential campaign website ahead of his formal kickoff Tuesday.

The slogan “Telling It Like It Is” appears on the site, a nod to the Republican's reputation for blunt talk in a state dominated by Democrats. A disclaimer says “Paid for by Chris Christie for President, Inc.” He posted a link to the site from his verified Twitter account.

A “special announcement event” is set for Tuesday at 11 a.m. local time at Livingston High School in Christie's hometown, said a press release from his campaign on Saturday. That evening, he plans to hold a town hall-style meeting—a staple format of his time as governor—in Sandown, New Hampshire, according to the release.

Christie will become the 14th candidate to join the Republican presidential primary contest for 2016, after months of travel to early-voting states and a stint as Republican Governors Association chairman that took him around the country to raise funds and campaign for others following his decision not to join the 2012 presidential race.

Chris Christie Launches Campaign Website Three Days Before His Announcement // National Journal // Nora Kelly – June 27, 2015

If the trips to New Hampshire and leaked announcement invitations weren't big enough clues, Chris Christie is in for 2016.

Like several other campaigns this cycle, Christie's team went for a digital-first approach ahead of any formal announcement: The New Jersey governor launched a campaign website on Saturday, just three days before he's expected to announce his White House bid from the gym of his high school alma mater in Livingston, N.J.

He signaled the site's launch in a series of tweets Saturday morning.

The simply designed ChrisChristie.com is emblazoned with his signature "Telling It Like It Is" slogan, has areas to sign up for the campaign and donate, and includes links to social media. (There's no cheeky 404 page just yet.)

Christie has been teasing a presidential run for months, making trips to Iowa and holding multiple town halls in New Hampshire. Just two days ago, he said on a New Jersey radio program that "there's been absolutely no final decision made by me."

Christie has some hurdles to climb: In his home state, his approval rating is at an all-time low at 30 percent. And as the 14th Republican to jump into the race, several of his fellow candidates are months of campaigning ahead of him.

Will Christie have enough campaign cash for his 2016 White House run? // NJ // Claude Brodesser-Akner – June 28, 2015

TRENTON — Gov. Chris Christie will declare his intent to seek the presidency on Tuesday, but he's been competing in the "invisible primary" for months now.

While not an officially sanctioned contest, it's considered the time from when a candidate shows interest in running for president and when voters start pulling levers for them during primaries. And it's a crucial period to raise money and make friends among the GOP's donor class.

But something funny happened in the last six months, according to Christie.

"Jeb Bush's strategy failed," said the governor, speaking on his monthly call-in radio show last week. "I mean, Jeb's strategy was to get in in December of 2014, and to intimidate people out of the race. Right? I mean, he was talking about all the money he was going to raise, and how it was the Bush name, and he was going to dominate. Well that hasn't happened. In fact, quite the opposite. In some ways, it's been a magnet."

The fact that the GOP field is the largest since Abraham Lincoln may have changed the monetary calculus for Christie, according to some of the donors supporting his run. They say rather than taking on one big-money candidate such as Bush, Christie will simply need enough to compete with the crowd of over a dozen, at least for now.

Christie's campaign, which went live on Saturday ahead of an formal announcement Tuesday, won't say officially just how much cash is needed But top Christie donor Al Hill, Jr. — the Texas oilman who's the grandson of billionaire H. L. Hunt — told NJ Advance Media: "My understanding is $20 million needs to be raised between now and the first of December."

Because federal election law limits the amount an individual can give to a federal candidate or a candidate's committee to $2,700 per election, and $5,000 per year to a political action committee, "obviously raising $20 million at $2,700 (per person) is a big road to get up," said Hill.

As the 14th contender to enter the race, Christie may be late in getting in the game, but that might have been by design. The real reason why Christie has waited so long, Hill says, likely has to do with those federal campaign finance laws just mentioned: As soon as he's a candidate, he won't be allowed to coordinate with his super-PAC, America Leads, and, as of only today, can't ask for contributions in excess of $2,700 to it once he's a candidate.

"The actual campaign fund (caps) start when you're an announced candidate – that's why a lot of people may have waited," said Hill, "To let the PACs raise as much as they can before they become announced candidates."

That actual campaign as begun as Christie began accepting donations for his presidential run on Saturday. His supporters say their efforts were already going well prior to the formal announcement. Bobbie Kilberg, president of the Northern Virginia Technology Council says her May 14 Virginia fundraiser for Christie's PAC raised $180,000.

"My next phase of fundraising will start soon, and I'll have a lot more people who want to contribute once he's a formal candidate," Kilberg said a few days before the campaign launch. "Lots of people want to wait and see who's in the field."

So while Mitt Romney's entire 2012 campaign cost a combined $1.2 billion, GOP strategists say Christie's narrow path to victory hinges on doing well in the small state of New Hampshire. Bill Greiner, a New Hampshire real estate developer and banker who held a meet-and-greet for Christie in his Bedford home on June 8, stressed: "You don't have to have a fortune to win this state."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

An insider at Christie's nascent campaign echoes as much, saying that "you don't have to have so much (cash)" in a tiny state like New Hampshire and a field this large.

"If you have $100 million, or $50 million or $10 million, you're going to be competitive," said the Christie campaign insider, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the person is not authorized to speak to the media about campaign matters. "It's going to be a crowded field where message is going to matter. We feel pretty good about where we are. We're going to have the resources."

Meanwhile, Hill says Christie's messaging is exceptional, even if standing in the polls isn't.

"What I have heard most often is, 'I want a candidate who will win the election.'" says Hill. "After the last few pretty close campaigns and races, everyone is pretty well ready for the pick to be a winner. People say, 'I've got my favorite, however I want someone who can win.'"

Hill thinks big ticket GOP donors are tired of candidates so conservative they cannot win. "They like the fact that he's had to work with a Democratic legislature. That's something that people continue to bring up about him," he said.

But in the meantime, it's still exceptionally early in the 2016 fundraising process, as Hill noted: "Most of my friends are in Colorado or Wyoming or Montana or somewhere for the summer. I've really not sure who's committed to do what for whom yet."

It's still early in New Hampshire, too, where a third of votes have yet to make up their minds, according to a Suffolk University poll, and where money isn't even being discussed yet among those circling Christie.

"I'm not on Team Christie but think a lot of him," said Tom Eaton, a former New Hampshire Senate president who is hosting an event with Christie at his lake house in Spofford, N.H. Thursday. "It's just a meet and greet, no talk of fundraising or anything else," said Eaton, who'll also being doing a similar event with Carly Fiorina in the weeks to come.

"They're not gonna open their wallets right at this point - that's a little bit down the road. Once the kids get back into school, things start happening."

Can Christie catch up to the other 2016 GOP contenders? // NJ // Jonathan D. Salant – June 27, 2015

WASHINGTON — Gov. Chris Christie sat atop opinion polls just a year ago. Then came Bridgegate. And former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush. And a bevy of other Republican candidates.

So Christie, who in July 2014 led an CNN/ORC International poll with 13 percent, fell to ninth place and 4 percent in the same survey in June 2015.

It shows that Christie, who plans to announce his candidacy for president next week, will start his campaign with a very steep mountain to climb.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"He had phenomenally positive approval ratings and then it all went downhill," said Peter Brown, assistant director of the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute in Hamden, Conn. "Although, given the crowded field for the nomination anything is possible, he does not start out impressive shape."

A summary of opinion polls by Real Clear Politics covering the period May 19 through June 23 placed Christie in ninth place with 4 percent. The top 10 candidates, as determined by an aggregation of polls, will be invited to participate in the first two Republican presidential debates by Fox News and CNN. The others will be invited to a separate event.

The latest Fox News survey, however, put Christie in 11th place. That one survey provided a clear example of Christie's drop in opinion polls; he was at 2 percent in June 2015 after receiving 15 percent in April 2014.

Christie led several opinion polls in 2013, including a November CNN survey that gave him 24 percent, nine points higher than second-place finisher U.S. Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky. As late as July of last year, he led all comers in the CNN poll.

But Christie polled just 6 percent in a Marist College/McClatchy poll in March of this year, and the June CNN survey put Christie in ninth place, just 2 percentage points ahead of 12th place finisher Rick Santorum, the former U.S. senator from Pennsylvania.

A December CNN poll put Christie at 13 percent, good enough for second place but 10 points behind Bush. Since then, the New Jersey governor has failed to reach double figures in any surveys, according to a compilation by Real Clear Politics. That compares to a stretch of 16 surveys from April 2013 to April 2014 in which he fell below 10 percent just once.

"In a crowded field, without a core following, he ends up falling deeper into the pack without a clear path to the nomination, said Lee Miringoff, director of the Marist College poll in Poughkeepsie, N.Y.

At the annual Conservative Political Action Committee Conference in February, Christie insisted that his dismal showing in recent opinion polls had no bearing on his chances to win the GOP nomination.

"If I decide to run for president, I'm not worried about what polls say 21 months before were going to elect the president of the United States," he said at the conference. "I'll take my chances on me. I've done pretty well so far."

While Christie was not indicted in the George Washington Bridge lane closing scandal, the incident has taken its toll, Miringoff said.

"He had one of two routes to take at that point," Miringoff said. "One was to admit that he messed up and ask forgiveness, the mea culpa route. The other was to say, 'I'm shocked,' the Casablanca route. That means he was not in charge of the details of staff management that he should have been."

Adding to Christie's problems is the perception that he has walked back his previous support of positions anathema to the Republican right, already skeptical of a governor who embraced President Obama after Hurricane Sandy. For example, he called in May for scrapping national Common Core education standards that he used to back.

"People have now seen him running around, somewhat adjusting positions," Miringoff said.

Bush's announcement in December that he was considering a presidential run meant Christie faced strong competition for donors and supporters among the Republican establishment. And the huge number of announced or potential 2016 GOP candidates is making it difficult for anyone to emerge as a clear frontrunner.

"Newer candidates become fresh faces," Brown said. "As they come in and join the race, Christie's numbers have deteriorated. There's more competition. A lot of people have small slices of the pie. Nobody has very much of the pie at this point."

Here's how Christie has fared in a sample of opinion polls over the last two years:

April, Quinnipiac, 14 percent

July, Marist/McClatchy, 15 percent

November, CNN/ORC, 24 percent

2014

February, Marist/McClatchy, 14 percent

April, Fox News, 15 percent

June, Quinnipiac, 10 percent

September, Marist/McClatchy, 12 percent

December, CNN/ORC, 13 percent

2015

February, Quinnipiac, 8 percent

April, Wall Street Journal/NBC News, 5 percent

June, Washington Post/ABC News, 6 percent

Has Christie's ship already sailed? // Inquirer // Thomas Fitzgerald – June 27, 2015

He had them at "sit down and shut up!"

In the summer of 2011, some Republican leaders and billionaire donors begged Gov. Christie to run for president to save the party. Less than thrilled with the available options, they loved his blunt style and success in a blue state. Christie wavered, but passed.

"Now is not my time," he said.

As Christie prepares to announce his 2016 presidential intentions Tuesday, after months of travels to early-voting states, some question whether he missed his moment. The Republican electorate seems to have given a collective shrug and moved on; Christie is near the bottom of the polls.

"You need to go when it's your time," said Douglas Gross, a Des Moines lawyer and GOP power broker. "The luster wore off. They pass the pie, and you'd better take your piece, because it's not coming around again. I don't sense a clamor for Christie."

His image has suffered some dents in the last 18 months, including the scandal over the 2013 lane closures on the George Washington Bridge in retribution against a Democratic mayor who would not endorse Christie's reelection. Two Christie allies were indicted, and one pleaded guilty to federal charges in the case. The governor has said he had no knowledge of the shutdown.

Also, New Jersey's economy grew just 0.4 percent in 2014, ranking 46th. The state's credit rating has been downgraded three times by each of the three ratings agencies under the Christie administration. And Atlantic City is falling apart.

Moreover, some on the GOP right mistrust Christie, considering him too moderate on social issues.

He has among the highest unfavorable ratings of the Republican contenders in most polls, a more reliable sign than horse-race numbers at this early stage of a candidate's potential standing.

Monmouth University's June 15 national poll, for instance, found Christie viewed favorably by 26 percent of likely Republican primary voters, and unfavorably by 43 percent - for a net of minus 17 percentage points. Fifty-five percent of Republicans in this month's Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll said they would never consider voting for Christie.

"There's a path for Christie, but it's a narrow one," said Patrick Murray, director of the Monmouth poll. "His high negatives and wide name recognition put a ceiling on his growth. He doesn't have much room for error."

And as for that blue-state electability, just 30 percent of New Jersey voters last week approved of Christie's job performance in a Fairleigh Dickinson University poll. And this is a governor who won reelection in a landslide, including carrying the Hispanic vote and gaining support from a majority of women - against a female opponent.

Christie's planning was based on his emerging as the establishment choice, a conservative but pragmatic governor who could appeal to moderates and be electable in November, strategists say. But he has been squeezed out. Others are competing to be that candidate, including governors with better economic records.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, and Ohio Gov. John Kasich all have establishment appeal. And then there's Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, son of a Baptist preacher, who has governing credibility and support among evangelical Christian conservatives. Walker and Kasich have not yet declared.

Even for voters who back Christie, he's not the only offering of whatever it is they like about him. Christie took on public-employee unions, but Walker went bigger, stripping bargaining rights from those workers and pushing through right-to-work legislation.

Christie, who began his political career supporting abortion rights, now brags about vetoing state funding for Planned Parenthood. Yet Bush became a hero to pro-life groups as he fought to keep life support going for Terri Schiavo, a woman in a persistent vegetative state. And Walker is pushing a ban on all abortions in his state after 20 weeks' gestation.

"One obstacle Christie faces is, what's his argument for taking it to the next level?" said Kevin Madden, a GOP consultant who was a senior adviser to the party's 2012 nominee, Mitt Romney. "He doesn't have a defining issue, a rationale."

Since his popularity began tumbling after "Bridgegate," Christie has sold himself as an in-your-face truth-teller on issues such as pension reform and as a champion of detailed conservative domestic policies, such as a plan to cut Social Security and Medicare spending, as well as a muscular foreign policy.

Christie also can try to set himself apart with the force of his personality. He has charisma, but to some voters, there is a fine line between tough talk and bullying.

Perry Hamilton, a Lower Merion activist who saw Christie speak June 19 at a regional GOP conference in Philadelphia, illustrates the governor's predicament.

"We have at least six guys just like him," said Hamilton, 63. While he appreciates Christie's blunt manner, Hamilton said it's also a weakness. "Attitude: Sometimes I could do without that."

The crowded field could have an upside for Christie.

As long as nobody is pulling away from the rest, almost anything is possible, and it doesn't take much to win or place well in an early state. The thinking of his strategists: Why not stick around and see what happens? Maybe the governor will emerge from the rubble.

Another reason not to short Christie stock: He has a team of loyal donors who include Home Depot CEO Ken Langone and hedge-fund manager Stanley Druckenmiller. Both are expected to write big checks to the governor's superPAC America Leads, which can raise and spend unlimited amounts. Christie may not have Bush-scale dollars, but he'll be able to compete.

Christie's advisers say they're not writing off the other early states, but they want to plant their flag in New Hampshire, which holds the first primary and is traditionally friendly to moderate candidates. Christie has spent at least 19 days in the state this year, more than most, taking hundreds of questions from the public in the town-hall meetings that are his political trademark back in New Jersey.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It could be paying off. While he is bunched in the middle of the pack (and well behind celebrity Donald Trump), Christie has a better favorable-to-unfavorable ratio in New Hampshire than he does nationally. A Suffolk University poll last week found him viewed favorably by 44 percent of Republican primary voters in the state, and unfavorably by 42 percent - for a margin of plus-2 percentage points.

New Hampshire "is tailor-made for a Chris Christie-style retail campaign," pollster Murray said. "One on one, there's no better candidate in the field."

Right after making his announcement Tuesday at his old high school in Livingston, N.J., Christie is expected to head to the Granite State.

He's in a weaker position in the first-voting state, Iowa, which is scheduled to hold caucuses Feb. 1. A Des Moines Register/Bloomberg poll earlier this month found 58 percent of Iowa Republicans viewed Christie negatively, with 45 percent ruling out a vote for him.

Even if Christie performs well in New Hampshire, it's unclear where that might lead.

He'll immediately run into a GOP electorate in South Carolina that is dominated by white evangelical Protestants. A Winthrop University poll in April found that nearly 56 percent of evangelicals said they would not consider voting for Christie, one of the highest negative rankings among would-be candidates.

"He hasn't really been in consideration, part of the conversation," said Chip Felkel, a Republican strategist in Greenville, S.C., who worked on the campaigns of both Presidents Bush and is not aligned this time.

"He's viewed right now as a second-tier wannabe," Felkel said. "He's got to find some way to get momentum. The question is, does Christie have the ability to convince conservatives of his bona fides and not damage himself for the general election?"

After South Carolina comes Nevada, then a succession of Southern states on Super Tuesday. In early March, there's Florida, where Bush and Rubio are expected to dominate.

For his part, Christie professes not to sweat the polls. "It's not make-or-break," he told reporters in Iowa this month, "until people start voting."

JINDAL

Growing up in Baton Rouge, Bobby Jindal's future passion for politics a surprise to most // The Advocate // Tyler Bridges – June 27, 2015

At a competitive high school filled with Baton Rouge's best and brightest, he chummed with the brainiest and highest achievers of all.

That's no surprise because Gov. Bobby Jindal is typically described these days as the smartest person in the room. He's a Brown University graduate and Rhodes scholar, after all. And he scored a 4.62 grade-point average at Baton Rouge Magnet High School when he graduated in 1988.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But this may be a surprise: He was not the valedictorian. Nor was he the salutatorian.

He ranked third among the 232 students.

And if you had asked teachers and classmates back then who might become a politician one day, they probably would have answered Tracy Smith. She was the senior class president. Or they might have mentioned Martin Johnson. He was one of the class's two delegates to Boys State, a high school training ground for aspiring politicians.

Jindal?

"He wanted to be a doctor at the time," said Kathy Reznick, his high school sweetheart, who went on to Tulane Law School and has returned to Baton Rouge.

More than anything, Jindal's demanding immigrant father EXPECTED him to become a doctor.

As a result, best friend Kent Shih was perhaps the only one who knew of his real ambition.

"His parents wanted him to go into medicine," Shih said. "He always wanted to go into politics."

For the first time in its 198-year history, a native of Baton Rouge is mounting a serious campaign to be president of the United States. And the intriguing story is how unlikely it is that it would be Jindal, according to nearly everyone who knew him in his formative years, except perhaps Shih, now a doctor in Nashville, Tennessee.

Teachers and classmates knew Jindal had a bright future. He was voted "most likely to succeed" among the boys in his class. And "Most Polite."

But Jindal had a narrow circle that consisted of the kids who took honors classes, got the best grades and organized parties where they challenged one another with obscure mathematical equations rather than beer-chugging contests. Jindal was typically home before midnight. He was more nerd than politician-on-the-make.

"He didn't hang out with the popular kids," said Susan Yang, who was the salutatorian and is now a doctor in St. Louis.

"He was reserved. He was not an extrovert," said Anu Goel Bourgeois, a close friend from the class of 1987 who is now a Georgia State University professor of computer science.

Slightly built and not a fan of team sports, Jindal didn't make a name for himself among the student body by winning athletic championships.

Instead, his main extracurricular activity was Mu Alpha Theta, the math club, which traveled to New Orleans and other cities on Saturdays to compete against other schools and which won the state championship in Jindal's senior year. He gladly provided after-school tutoring for classmates like Dione Hasse, now a management consultant in Nashville, who couldn't quite keep up.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"He showed up to meetings with bright green pants and a pink polo shirt with an upturned collar," Hasse said with a laugh. "He was trying to be Mr. Preppy."

The adolescent years are crucial for anyone, of course. In Jindal's case, while growing up in Baton Rouge, he Americanized his name, converted to Christianity, began to show off his high-wattage brain power and only occasionally flashed an interest in public policy, but always from a conservative bent.

Thousands of articles have been written about Jindal since he first burst onto the scene in 1996, when newly elected Gov. Mike Foster named him secretary of the Department of Health and Hospitals at the precocious age of 24.

None have plumbed his years growing up.

Jindal's parents moved from India to Baton Rouge on Feb. 1, 1971, so his mother could study nuclear physics in graduate school at LSU. Their son, whom they named Piyush, was born on June 10.

In a recent interview, Jindal said the family initially lived in Tiger Town just off Nicholson Drive.

He was about 4 when his mother picked him up from school one day. As he told the story, "a teacher said, 'Look, your son came to school and asked everyone to start calling him Bobby.' "

He took it from one of the characters on "The Brady Bunch," the 1970s sitcom.

"That was one of the shows I'd watch after school," Jindal said. "Bobby was about my age."

His parents were concerned and asked, " 'Are you going to be Greg tomorrow? Are you going to pick a different name the next day?' Once they realized that it was going to stick, they didn't have any objection."

In 1978 or so, the Jindals moved to Kenilworth, a new subdivision near LSU, populated by university professors and oil industry engineers. By then, Bobby had a brother named Nikesh, who is seven years younger.

His father, Amar, worked as a civil engineer, while his mother, Raj, worked at the state labor department as a data processor.

The family's new ranch-style home, at 7526 Cardiff Ave., had three bedrooms, a brick exterior and a shingle roof. Bobby's mother had exclusive use of the master bathroom while the three males shared the hallway bathroom. Bobby and his brother played in the yard and rode bikes in the neighborhood. Bobby played tennis through BREC.

"Kenilworth was an idyllic place to grow up," Jindal said. "It was one of those neighborhoods where you could tell the kids to go and play outside and come back when it's dark."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In his early years, no Hindu temple existed in Baton Rouge. So the Jindals and other Indian families met on most Sundays at someone's home for Hindu ceremonies known as pujas, followed by meals featuring curries and other Indian food.

The family didn't socialize with the neighbors, remembered Barbara Michael, who raised a family two houses down.

But his parents insisted that they assimilate into American culture, Jindal said.

"My mom was fully committed to raising us as Americans," he said. "That was a conscious decision. We ate food that would be familiar to other families in south Louisiana. She wanted to raise us like other kids in the neighborhood."

Jindal attended the private Runnels School through fourth grade and then moved to the public Greenville Elementary School for fifth and then scored well enough to attend Istrouma Middle Magnet for sixth grade and then moved to McKinley Middle Magnet School for seventh and eighth grades. It was at McKinley that Ajay Jindia, who was one year older, saw a flash of his later career.

"I remember having a conversation at his house where he was preaching the benefits of Reaganomics," said Jindia, now an Atlanta lawyer, referring to the economic philosophy of President Ronald Reagan.

From McKinley, Jindal moved on to Baton Rouge Magnet. The high school had an unusual social dynamic. With no football, baseball or basketball teams — and no cheerleaders — the brainiacs were almost cool.

Jindal is known today for talking fast. His high school friends talk fast, too.

"You could be proud, be smart and be a nerd," Yang said. "Nerds were not outcasts."

Most of Jindal's closest friends were, like him, the children of Asian immigrants who embraced the United States as the land of opportunity and pushed their children to succeed by out-studying everyone else.

"My dad was always reinforcing to my brother and I that you should dream big to achieve anything in life," Nikesh said. "It requires a lot of hard work and doing academically well in school. That was a message that was continually reinforced by our parents, particularly our dad."

Jindal and his brother (who would go on to Dartmouth University) took that message to heart. Jindal got only a single B in high school, for a term paper on Huey Long, said Shih, who added, "He was pissed." (Through his press secretary, Jindal said he got more than one B but wasn't specific.)

Jindal was active in an array of extracurricular groups that would make a college admissions officer swoon: the Beta Club, the Junior Academy of Science, the Latin Club and Interact, a service club.

But his biggest passion was the math club.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The members raised money by working a concessions booth at LSU football games and played spades on bus trips to tournaments outside of Baton Rouge.

Jindal captained the Equations team, which required quick thinking.

And he dressed like Alex P. Keaton, the conservative high schooler played by Michael J. Fox in the ’80s sitcom “Family Ties.”

“He had a bow tie with dollar bills on it,” said Elaine Parsons, who is now a history professor at Duquesne University. “When the movie ‘Wall Street’ came out, he’d go around saying, ‘Greed is good!’ People would roll their eyes at him.”

For years, Jindal bought bags of candy that he would keep in his backpack and sell individual pieces to sugar-craving students.

Some classmates view it now as a sign of a would-be political operator.

“But I always thought of it as more entrepreneurial,” said Johnson, who is now a professor of political communication at LSU.

Classmates and others who knew Jindal during his formative years remember him fondly. But they watch in awe or dismay, depending on their political beliefs, at how he has transformed into a conservative firebrand.

They first began to see the inklings of his future political success after he graduated from Baton Rouge Magnet.

Richard Juneau, who raised a family across the street from the Jindals, was struck by his maturity when they talked one day when Jindal was visiting Baton Rouge while a Rhodes scholar.

“I was so impressed with him,” Juneau said. “He was such a good conversationalist. He was above and beyond the normal 20-year-old.”

Enoch Huang, a Baton Rouge Magnet classmate and friend, was struck by his polish and confidence when Jindal as DHH secretary spoke at Tulane, where Huang was attending medical school.

“It was a very different side of Bobby,” he said. “He was on top of everything. It was very humbling.”

Jindal has little contact today with his high school friends. Many of them last saw him when he hosted their 20th reunion at the Governor’s Mansion.

For an hour or so, his classmates pinched themselves on one of their own holding the most important job in the state. Several of them made snarky comments about how Jindal had developed a Southern accent during his political climb in Louisiana.

But the conversation stopped when he and his wife, Supriya, appeared and slowly made their way down the grand staircase. The crowd began to cheer, and classmates lined up to shake his hand and ask for a photo.

Bobby Jindal sidesteps gay marriage ruling's meaning for Louisiana // Times-Picayune // Julia O'Donoghue – June 27, 2015

Speaking on the front porch of the Governor's Mansion, incumbent Bobby Jindal reiterated Saturday (June 27) that Louisiana eventually will comply with the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling legalizing gay marriage in all 50 states. But he wouldn't say exactly what that will mean for same-sex couples in the state.

"Our agencies will follow the law and we will do it in a way that respects individuals' religious liberty rights, but we'll follow the law," Jindal said before heading into a reception for his staff and presidential campaign supporters. The governor refused to say whether "following the law" might let same-sex couples not only marry but receive other benefits they don't currently enjoy.

Gay rights advocates assume the Supreme Court decision will give same-sex couples not only access to marriage but also joint adoption, spousal benefits in the workplace and joint tax filings like other legally married couples in Louisiana.

Initially, Jindal stopped short of saying that these types of benefits would be extended to same-sex couples. He said he had to wait on rulings from lower courts before getting into specifics about what might change in Louisiana.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans and the Louisiana Supreme Court currently are considering cases involving gay marriage. They must take the U.S. Supreme Court's decision to affirm gay marriage into account when issuing their own rulings.

Later on Saturday, after the governor's meeting with the press, Jindal's presidential campaign spokesman Kyle Plotkin said the governor believes the lower court decisions will result in same-sex married couples receiving benefits in Louisiana.

"While we disagree... the state agencies will comply with the law, and that will, of course, including benefits [for same-sex couples]," Plotkin said.

A number of same-sex married couples also eagerly await being able to join their spouse's health insurance and retirement plans, among other things. Elaine Maccio, a professor at Louisiana State University, said she and her partner had to pay "through the nose" for separate health care plans when her partner lost a job. Now they are both employed, but the months of paying for two different health care plans left them financially strapped.

Same-sex married couples, including those who have valid marriage licenses from other states, also want to be able to collect government tax refunds after having to pay state taxes as a single person for years. "There is the possibility of amended returns for previous years. I know people who would do that tomorrow if they could," said Matthew Patterson, research and policy coordinator for Equality Louisiana.

Louisiana and Mississippi are outliers in their handling of the Supreme Court's gay marriage decision. They are the only two states that refused to issue marriage license to same-sex couples after the court's ruling was issued Friday morning.

Renouncing roots: Here's why Bobby Jindal is not popular among the Indian-American community in US // India Times // Ishani Duttagupta – June 28, 2015

Bobby Jindal is so white, he refers to Indian food as "ethnic cuisine." American stand-up comic Hari Kondabolu, on Twitter

It's not just the US that isn't quite sitting up to notice Bobby Jindal throwing his hat into the 2016 presidential ring — the 44-year-old governor of Louisiana is after all among 26 Republican candidates (at last count) running for office. Even the desi community appears distinctly unmoved, which is surprising if you consider that Jindal is the first Indian-American to be running for America's top job.

There's of course a reason for that dispassion (along with digs like "Bobby Jindal is so white, he beat himself up after 9/11," another Kondabolu tweet). "Jindal's announcement that he is running for president could have been the turning point for the entire community, but he does not enjoy support of the Indian-Americans either at the grassroots level or from top fundraisers because of his controversial comments about not wanting to be seen as a hyphenated American," a prominent Indian-American Republican fundraiser who didn't want to be identified said.

If there were any doubts about how close — or rather how far —Jindal is from his local roots, he dispelled them in a spectacular style earlier this week when he launched his presidential campaign. "We are not Indian-Americans, African-Americans, Irish-Americans, rich Americans, or poor Americans. We are all Americans," thundered the first Indian-American to be elected a governor in the US.

It didn't take long for an eruption back home in India on social media, and the hashtag #BobbyJindalIsSoWhite duly went to become one of the top trending topics on Twitter on Thursday, a day after Jindal, who grew up as a Hindu before converting to Christianity when in his teens, made the statement.

Renouncing Roots

Niraj J Antani, 24, a Republican who was last year elected to the Ohio House of Representatives, believes that the Indian-American community will only support Jindal if he embraces his heritage. One of the youngest state lawmakers in the US, Antani even believes that the governor can become president if he embraces the reality of being an Indian-American.

"The American people want authenticity in their elected officials and governor Jindal can show that by embracing his heritage," Antani told ET Magazine. He adds that Jindal has made some remarks that are of particular concern to the Indian-American community. "I am myself proud to be the second Indian-American elected in Ohio's history. I hope that Jindal will also be proud of being an Indian-American. Only then will he get the support of the community," Antani added. If not, he feels, the campaign will be a highly disappointing one.

A section of Indian-Americans, however doesn't foresee the governor attempting to mend fences with the community.

"The basic issue for the support from the Indian-Americans would be the image of Jindal in the community. He has not developed a positive relationship and has not even identified himself as an Indian-American," says Piyush Agrawal, a Florida-based community activist, who was a close associate of former president George W Bush and is seen as the mover a n d shaker behind starting the tradition of Diwali being celebrated at the White House for the first time in 2003.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Vinod Gupta, a close friend of Bill and Hillary Clinton, who in the past has been considered among the biggest contributors to the Democratic Party, too doesn't see much of support for Jindal from Indian-Americans. "Jindal was born and raised in the US and hasn't been part of the Indian immigrant experience and doesn't identify with it," Gupta said.

When announcing his presidential bid, Jindal did mention his parents who immigrated from India, but that may not be enough to please the desi community.

"Jindal is, to most Indian-Americans exactly what they do not want their children to become — a person orphaned from traditions, heritage and religion that nurtured him, who openly and publicly disavows his community.

His failure as a leader in Louisiana, and his embrace of a far-right evangelical ideology, leaves him with nothing in common with most Indian Americans," says Aseem Shukla, a member of the Hindu American Foundation board of directors and associate professor of surgery at the University of Pennsylvania School of Medicine. He adds that Jindal had ample opportunities to represent Indian-Americans — from supporting the Congressional Diwali resolution when he was in Congress, to speaking up for religious liberty issues — but he never reached out.

Fractured Support

Jindal, who became the second Indian-American to be elected to the US Congress in 2004, was re-elected in 2006; according to Shukla, his journey is inspiring for young Indian-Americans and it proves that it is possible to overcome racial barriers in politics. "But his experience also proves that the racial ceiling was broken over the back of religious identity where an Indian rejected his heritage and religious traditions," Shukla said.

Jindal's achievements in the political arena are not lost on the Indian community despite his efforts to distance himself.

"What he has achieved in public life at such a young age is incredible and he is definitely admired for that," says Sanjay Puri, chairman of the Washington DC based US Indian Political Action Committee.

However, he thinks that the Indian-American support for Republican candidates was likely to get fractured and divided because of the large number in the running. "Jeb Bush has strong ties with Indian-American Republicans in Florida while governor Chris Christie is from New Jersey which has a large Indian-American population. Democratic candidate Hillary Clinton too has long standing ties with the Indian-American community," Puri added.

Column: Most GOP voters support allowing undocumented immigrants to stay, poll says // Des Moines Register // Kathie Obradovich - June 27, 2015

Ohio Gov. John Kasich, making his first Iowa trip last week as a potential presidential candidate, advocated for creating a path to legal status for the estimated 12 million undocumented immigrants living in the United States.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Well, look, we’re not going to ship all these people out. You know, they ditched the line and they’re going to have to pay a penalty and we’ve got to make sure they haven’t engaged in criminal activity and we have to protect our border.”

Such a position runs against the grain of most Iowa Republicans who oppose “amnesty” for people who live in this country illegally. Or does it?

Public-opinion research by a pro-immigration group in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina suggests narrow political definitions of “amnesty” don’t match the attitudes of likely voters.

More than three-quarters of likely Iowa Republican caucusgoers — 77 percent — would support a candidate who favors a multi-step process allowing undocumented immigrants to earn citizenship. An even greater majority, 81 percent, would support a candidate who favors a process leading to legal residency but not citizenship.

That’s according to a poll of 400 likely Iowa GOP caucusgoers conducted in April for the Partnership for a New American Economy by Burning Glass Consulting. The consulting firm’s founding partner, Katie Packer Gage, was the deputy communications manager for Mitt Romney’s 2012 campaign.

The Partnership for a New American Economy is a non-partisan group that advocates for comprehensive immigration reform. It found similar willingness among likely primary voters in New Hampshire and South Carolina to consider a candidate who favored a process for letting undocumented people stay.

John Stineman is a Republican consultant who works with the Partnership for a New American Economy in Iowa and nationally. He said the organization wanted to test the assumption that Republican candidates had to take a hard line on immigration to win the Iowa caucuses or other early-state contests.

In fact, he said, polling and focus group interviews showed that once a candidate specifies an intent to secure the border, plans aimed at allowing undocumented immigrants already in the country to earn legal status or even citizenship is far from a deal-breaker.

No more than one in five likely voters in the three early states is a hard-line, single-issue voter on immigration, he said. That’s someone who bases their vote largely on immigration and who wants no opportunity for illegal immigrants to stay. Only 17 percent of likely Iowa Republican caucus-goers fit that description.

“Toward the perception that if they go hard right in primary, than that’s what they are going to need to do, but the reality is there’s no more than one in five Republicans in any of the early states that are hard-line, single-issue voters,” Stineman said.

Republicans generally disapprove of amnesty for illegal immigrants, but what is amnesty? A majority of likely Iowa GOP caucusgoers — 63 percent— agree that executive orders granting temporary legal status to 4 million undocumented immigrants qualifies as amnesty. But that’s the limit of the accord.

Half of likely caucusgoers think it’s amnesty if illegal immigrants are given a pathway to citizenship if they pay a fine, any back taxes, pass a background check, learn English and take other required steps. Only 40 percent call it amnesty if people complete all of those steps to receive legal residency but not citizenship.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Only 28 percent define amnesty as any action short of securing the border and stronger enforcement of existing law.

"We just need to delete the word 'amnesty,' " Stineman said, noting that it has ceased to mean anything.

Besides Kasich, who has yet to decide whether he'll run for president, Jeb Bush, Rand Paul, Marco Rubio, Lindsey Graham and George Pataki have at some point advocated for a path to legal status for undocumented immigrants. Some of the other GOP candidates have made statements acknowledging the improbability of deporting 11 million or 12 million people, but few have offered detailed plans for moving candidates toward legal status.

Most of the Democrats in the race, including Hillary Clinton, Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley, have called for comprehensive immigration reform that includes a path to citizenship.

With such a huge field for the GOP nomination, it's conceivable a candidate could win the Iowa caucuses with less than 20 percent. That might make it worthwhile for some candidates to attempt to unify that minority of hard-line immigration voters.

However, there's a price to pay in the general election for candidates who do that, polling shows. The Partnership polled 800 likely general-election voters in these battleground states: Iowa, Colorado, Florida, Michigan, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Ohio, Virginia and Wisconsin. Single-issue voters who want comprehensive reform outnumber single-issue, hard-line voters by a margin of 2 to 1.

Fifty-three percent of battleground-state voters said they would be less likely to vote for a candidate they viewed as anti-immigration, compared with 29 percent who said that wouldn't matter to their vote.

This polling is from an issue advocate, to be sure, but the pollster has been fully transparent in releasing data and methodology. It's clear from this that voters expect candidates — of both parties — to have a plan for dealing with undocumented immigrants. Merely securing the border is not a plan.

The Partnership for a New American Economy/Burning Glass Poll of 400 likely GOP caucus or primary voters in each of the three early states, taken April 9-15, has a margin of error of plus or minus 5 percentage points. The swing-state poll of 804 voters, taken May 6-11, has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.5 points.

As Left Wins Culture Battles, G.O.P. Gains Opportunity to Pivot for 2016 // NYT // Jonathan Martin – June 27, 2015

WASHINGTON — A cascade of events suggests that 2015 could be remembered as a Liberal Spring: the moment when deeply divisive and consuming questions of race, sexuality and broadened access to health care were settled in quick succession, and social tolerance was cemented as a cornerstone of American public life.

Yet what appears, in headlines and celebrations across the country, to represent an unalloyed victory for Democrats, in which lawmakers and judges alike seemed to give in to the leftward shift of public opinion, may contain an opening for the Republican Party to move beyond losing battles and seemingly lost causes.

Conservatives have, in short order, endured a series of setbacks on ideas that, for some on the right, are definitional: that marriage is between a man and a woman, that Southern heritage and its symbols are to be unambivalently revered and that the federal government should play a limited role in the lives of Americans.

Remarkably, some of these verities have been challenged not by liberals but by figures from the right.

The past week and the month that preceded it have been nothing short of a rout in the culture wars. Bruce Jenner, the famed Olympian, became Caitlyn Jenner in the most prominent moment yet for transgender people. The killings of nine black churchgoers in Charleston, S.C., at once rendered the Confederate battle flag unsuitable for government-sanctioned display. And Friday's legalization of same-sex marriage nationwide elevated a community that had been consigned to the shadows for centuries of American life.

But even as conservatives appear under siege, some Republicans predict that this moment will be remembered as an effective wiping of the slate before the nation begins focusing in earnest on the presidential race.

As important as some of these issues may be to the most conservative elements of the party's base and in the primaries ahead, few Republican leaders want to contest the 2016 elections on social or cultural grounds, where polls suggest that they are sharply out of step with the American public.

"Every once in a while, we bring down the curtain on the politics of a prior era," said David Frum, the conservative writer. "The stage is now cleared for the next generation of issues. And Republicans can say, 'Whether you're gay, black or a recent migrant to our country, we are going to welcome you as a fully cherished member of our coalition.' "

The critical question is whether the Republican Party will embrace such a message in order to seize what many party officials see as an opening to turn the election toward economic and national security issues.

It will not happen easily: Every major Republican presidential candidate criticized the Supreme Court's ruling on Friday affirming same-sex marriage as the law of the land.

Of course, many of the Republicans running for president are keen to move on from the culture wars, but others, like Mike Huckabee and Senator Ted Cruz of Texas, are already seizing on matters like same-sex marriage and what they call judicial overreach to distinguish themselves in a crowded primary field. And the conservative activists and interest groups that play an important role in the primary will not let any of the candidates simply move on.

"Our candidates running in a primary are put in a little bit of a box by the events of this week, but at the same time, it does change the landscape for the general election, which is a blessing," said Carl Forti, a Republican strategist who has worked on presidential races. "I'm glad I'm not on a campaign and don't have to advise my candidate on how to navigate those three issues this week, because the answers for the primary and the general are radically different."

Privately, some of the strategists advising Republican hopefuls believe the last week has been nothing short of a gift from above — a great unburdening on issues of race and sexuality, and on health care a disaster averted. Rhetorical opposition to the Affordable Care Act will still be de rigueur in the primaries, but litigating the issue in theory is wholly different from doing so with more than six million people deprived of their health insurance.

Collectively, this optimistic thinking would have it, June will go down as the month that dulled some of the wedge issues Democrats were hoping to wield next year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Whether the presidential candidates agree or disagree with the results of all this, it allows them to say these issues have been settled and move on to things that offer more of a political home-field advantage,” said Tim Pawlenty, the former Republican governor of Minnesota.

While acknowledging that the country has become more tolerant and, in some ways, culturally liberal, many Republicans contend that America is still receptive to a more conservative approach on economics and national security. After all, the same week that highlighted the ascent of cultural liberalism also illustrated the limitations of economic populism, as organized labor was unable to block a measure giving President Obama expansive trade authority.

“There will always be side issues, but none of that will compete with people’s primary concerns, which are the economy and who is going to be able to keep the country safe,” said Whit Ayres, a Republican pollster advising Senator Marco Rubio of Florida.

Yet as the 2012 presidential race demonstrated, the immediate demands of a Republican primary can outweigh the eventual priorities of a general election. And, given last week’s events, conservative hard-liners in the coming Republican contest will be even hungrier for candidates to demonstrate that they are willing to employ all possible means to repel what they see as an assault on foundational values.

“We have been observing the deconstructing of America in the last six and a half years,” said Tony Perkins, the head of the conservative Family Research Council. “The tolerance level has been exceeded.”

What outrages social conservatives is not only the narrow issue of same-sex marriage rights, but also what they see as a violation of religious liberties that they believe are intrinsic to the country.

When Senator Cruz said the past week had featured “some of the darkest 24 hours in our history,” he spoke for those conservatives who believe the America they know is slipping away.

What is unclear about the wide Republican field is whether a candidate has yet surfaced who is deft enough to appeal to such devoted conservatives without going so far to mollify them as to scare away less dogmatic voters.

Of the well-financed candidates, Jeb Bush has done the most, on matters of race and marriage, to portray himself as a candidate who can appeal to a more socially tolerant country. Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, who made his name on fiscal issues, has surprised some in the party by positioning himself on the right on cultural issues. Mr. Rubio has been more cautious, trying not to inflame primary voters while also speaking in a measured fashion to avoid harming himself if he is the nominee.

Yet even if the party’s eventual standard-bearer can win the nomination without providing much fodder for Democrats to use in the general election, he or she will not be able to ignore cultural issues entirely. Self-identified white evangelical voters can make up as much as 40 percent of a Republican presidential nominee’s vote.

That is what worries many of the party’s strategists. “Some of our candidates will play to them and take positions that aren’t helpful in a general election,” Mr. Forti said.

And while a window may be open for Republicans to shift the race in a different direction, Democrats will do their best to keep the focus on subjects many Republican candidates want to avoid. Many of them, Hillary

In a fast-changing culture, can the GOP get in step with modern America? // WaPo // Philip Rucker and Robert Costa – June 27, 2015

CORYDON, Iowa — Mike Huckabee — former Fox News personality, Arkansas governor and Baptist preacher — gathered with a modest crowd here in the back of Breadeaux Pizza on his "Main Street American Family" tour and opened the floor to questions.

The very first one set the tone. Jeff Hontz, 49, a Baptist pastor in town, said he has been anxious because he sees "America going down the wrong roads morally." God decreed unchanging standards in Scripture, Hontz argued, but society keeps changing — and fast.

"I saw a commercial this morning about a transgender show, and everybody was praising it," he said, prodding the presidential candidate.

Huckabee responded by declaring that the standard of all truth is the Bible. Distorting the laws of nature, he said, is akin to playing the piano without a tuning fork — or baking a cake without the proper measurements of salt, flour and sugar. "You're going to have a disaster on your hands," he said.

The exchange illustrates the vexing challenge now facing Republican presidential candidates and the GOP itself: how to get in step with modern America.

Across the cultural landscape, the national consensus is evolving rapidly, epitomized by this year's convulsions of celebrity, social issues and politics — including the acceptance of Caitlyn Jenner's gender identity, Pope Francis's climate-change decree and the widespread shunning of the Confederate flag.

Then came Friday's landmark Supreme Court decision legalizing same-sex marriage. As rainbow colors bathed the White House and other landmarks in celebration, the entire field of Republican presidential candidates condemned the ruling.

This uneven terrain is now a key battlefield in the 2016 campaign, unnerving red America and fueling intense debate within the Republican Party about how to navigate such changes — or whether to adapt to the mainstream at all.

"Most Republicans look at what's happening and think we're watching a new stage of left-wing nuttiness," said former House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.). "It's just surreal."

The GOP's activist base wants its leaders to fight loudly for traditional, Christian values and sew together a moral fabric they see as frayed, even shredded. This is especially true here in Iowa, which hosts the first caucuses and where candidates will not easily avoid pressure from the far right. Yet political survival demands evolution with popular opinion.

So far, many contenders are giving the base what it wants.

"We're called upon not to be the thermometers that reflect the temperature in the culture," Huckabee said in

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Corydon. “We’re called upon to be thermostats, which can read the temperature and seek to adjust it to where it should be.”

Democrats are hoping for just this approach. They argue — as many Republican Party elites in Washington fear — that if Republicans don’t moderate on issues such as gay rights and immigration and become more tolerant, they will be locked out of the White House. Asked how Democratic front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton could motivate voters, several top Democratic officials said: The Republicans may do it for her.

“Republicans are going to have to make inner peace about living in a same-sex marriage world,” said Pete Wehner, a former adviser to President George W. Bush. “Our nominee can’t have serrated edges. Like it or not, any effort to create moral or social order will be seen as rigid and judgmental. . . . Grace and winsomeness are the ingredients for success in a world where cultural issues are at the fore.”

‘Get with modern life’

This is a profound shift for a party that a decade earlier won national elections under a banner of social conservatism. In 2004, Bush successfully used his opposition to gay marriage as a wedge issue in his reelection campaign.

“If these topics are the big ones in the general election — rather than the failure of President Obama and Hillary Clinton as his third term, foreign policy, and of course the economy — we can’t win,” said Austin Barbour, a Mississippi-based operative who runs the super PAC supporting former Texas governor Rick Perry. “We need to be sensible, logical and reasonable on the social issues, but also make sure the debate isn’t entirely about them.”

The shifts to the left on social issues may be reinforcing pessimistic beliefs among Republicans about the direction of the country. In a CBS/New York Times poll last month, 88 percent of Republicans said the nation was on the wrong track, compared with 63 percent of Americans as a whole. Meanwhile, 57 percent of Democrats said the country was headed in the right direction.

“When a young voter sees a Republican coming, many of them roll their eyes and wonder why they can’t get with modern life,” said Ari Fleischer, White House press secretary under George W. Bush.

The party’s business wing has been evolving quickly on many social issues, particularly on gay rights. Religious liberty measures in Indiana and Arkansas that many saw as discriminatory against gays drew immediate backlash earlier this year from local chambers of commerce — not to mention corporations such as Wal-Mart, the red-state retail giant — prompting reversals from Republican governors.

“The country is changing, the culture is changing, the demographics are changing and politics is changing,” said former Minnesota governor Tim Pawlenty, now president of the Financial Services Roundtable. “The rhetoric at the congressional level and with some of the candidates tends to be a lagging indicator.”

In far-flung state capitols, legislatures that became more solidly Republican during the past two midterm election sweeps are moving aggressively with social policy designed to combat what conservative lawmakers see as liberal encroachment from Washington. For instance, bills to ban abortions after 20 weeks are moving in several state legislatures.

Politicians are responding to the deep angst conservative activists voice in their communities. At a Huckabee event Wednesday night in Osceola, Iowa, Mary Klein, a 79-year-old school nurse, invoked an urban legend.

“Have you heard about the frogs?” Klein asked. “When you put a bunch of frogs in water and you heat it, they don’t realize the temperature is getting warmer and warmer and warmer. Then it kills them. Our country is getting neutralized, at small degrees at a time, and we won’t realize it until we’re already sucked in and it’s too late.”

‘Kindness of conservatism’

Among the 16 declared or likely Republican presidential candidates, there is general agreement on traditional social policies, such as opposing gay marriage and abortion rights. The differences come in tone, emphasis and countenance.

“We can share our views without sounding like avenging angels,” said Rep. Peter T. King (R-N.Y.). “It’s the self-righteous tone that scares more than the views themselves.”

Major GOP donors, especially those in high finance in New York, have been privately quizzing leading presidential candidates on same-sex marriage. Some have been turned off by Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, thinking the son of a Baptist preacher to be too strident in his opposition, and preferring former Florida governor Jeb Bush and Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.) because they suggest a more laissez-faire attitude.

Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), an even-tempered ally of House Speaker John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), recalled: “Ronald Reagan was awfully good at not backing off his position while also never yelling or shouting or pounding the table. Persuasion, persistence and resolve — that was his magic.”

Arthur Brooks, president of the American Enterprise Institute, said that speaking only to the base about issues of God, guns, gays and abortion isn’t enough to win. “Republicans need to recognize this and change the terms of the conversation — or they’ll pay the price for decades,” Brooks said.

One likely candidate trying to soften the party’s language is Ohio Gov. John Kasich, who espouses what he calls “the kindness of conservatism.” A devout Christian, Kasich looks to the activist pope as a model.

In Iowa last week, Kasich advocated a pathway to citizenship for illegal immigrants — a lightning-rod issue in the Republican primary season. When he encountered an undocumented woman and her young son, Kasich said, “They are made in the image of the Lord.”

By contrast, businessman Donald Trump railed against illegal immigrants in his campaign announcement speech. He said the United States had become a “dumping ground” for drug abusers, “rapists” and other criminals from Mexico.

On Thursday night in Iowa, former Pennsylvania senator Rick Santorum gave a fiery speech promising to lead what he called a cultural battle against the “secular left.” He said, “It will be tough to stand against it, but we must.”

Democrats are eager to portray Republicans as the party of Trump, Santorum and Huckabee, as well as retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, Sen. Ted Cruz (Tex.) and Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal — all candidates who proudly resist the shifting social mores.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a particularly partisan speech Friday night in Northern Virginia, Clinton said Republican candidates "seemed determined to lead us right back into the past" with their responses to the high court's gay marriage ruling.

"Instead of trying to turn back the clock, they should be joining us in saying loudly and clearly: 'No to discrimination once and for all,' " Clinton said, adding, "A lot of Republicans may talk about having new ideas and fresh faces, but across the board, they're the party of the past, not the future."

Housing Secretary Julián Castro, a potential Democratic vice presidential candidate whose ancestors emigrated from Mexico, criticized Trump in a recent interview for "plainly insulting Mexicans and by extension folks who are the descendants of Mexicans.

"He will be in this campaign in many ways the face of the Republican Party, because he has higher name identification than almost all of them," Castro said.

'Tolerance only goes so far'

Huckabee, asked during an interview in Iowa how he might modulate his language on social issues, said he does not see any political disadvantage in standing up for his conservative beliefs, as long as voters see them as genuine.

"I think people are deeply interested in issues of morality, character, but it all goes back to trustworthiness and authenticity," Huckabee said. He added, "The question is: Can I articulate my view, defend it, do it rationally and in a way that's intellectually honest, without being hateful or spiteful?"

Along Huckabee's tour in rural Iowa last week, voters dismissed any suggestion that the GOP needed to modernize.

After seeing him campaign Thursday morning at the Dinky Diner in Decatur City, Tracee Knapp, secretary of the Ringgold County Republican Party, concluded that unlike party elites in Washington, "he's not neutered."

"I'm just sick of secular things," she said. "Homosexual issues are on the television all the time. I'll be honest — we live on a farm. We have to have a bull and a cow to make a baby. We have to have a rooster and a hen. Maybe some Republicans need to come live on a farm."

The night before in Osceola, Tawny Waske, 49, was celebrating her eighth wedding anniversary with her husband, Tim, at Nana Greer's Family Table restaurant when Huckabee walked in to shake hands and answer questions. She, too, fretted about cultural changes.

"It's legalized here for gays [to marry], and we just bite our lips," Waske said. "As a Christian, we're taught to love the sinner, not the sin. But tolerance only goes so far."

Waske brought up ABC's prime-time special this spring on Jenner's gender transition.

The Straight Talk Express Gets a Few More Passengers // TIME // Alex Altman and Zeke J Miller – June 27, 2015

It takes a savvy politician to run for president by telling people what they don't want to hear—or perhaps a crazy one. Yet here was Lindsey Graham, South Carolina's senior senator, shuffling into the state capitol June 22 to advocate the removal of the Confederate flag. Graham's nascent presidential campaign depends on winning the Palmetto State — where six in 10 voters oppose the relocation of the rebel emblem.

But it wasn't the first time Graham, who supports comprehensive immigration reform and climate science, has put conscience ahead of his constituents. And he's hardly the only candidate risking the repercussions of defying the party base as the race for the White House ramps up.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush has stuck by his moderate positions on education and immigration. New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie will make controversial entitlement reforms a cornerstone of his comeback bid. Ohio Gov. John Kasich infuriated conservative activists by expanding Medicaid in Ohio. And long-shot candidate former New York Gov. George Pataki has made disagreeing with his party's mainstream a point of pride.

The maverick style has gone mainstream. Fifteen years after John McCain tried to ride the Straight Talk Express to the GOP nomination, the truth-telling persona has become as much a fixture of presidential campaigning as the flag pin. And in the 2016 Republican primary, more candidates than ever before are betting that a base-bucking approach will pay off with voters sick of the quadrennial presidential pander.

"You have to understand," Kasich explained to TIME in a recent interview, "the Republican Party is my vehicle, and not my master."

All this is a stark change from the 2012 campaign, when the GOP field was desperate to indulge the activist base that seemed to hold the keys to the White House. The rush to the right often manifested in ways that were embarrassing or ugly. There was the debate where nearly the entire field pledged to veto a 10-to-1 deal of spending cuts for new tax revenue—a pact most sensible conservatives would snap up in a second. There was the collective unwillingness to call out conservative radio host Rush Limbaugh's ad hominem attack against women's rights' activist Sandra Fluke. There was the forum in Florida where the candidates stood idly by as a gay soldier was booed on live television.

Yet four years later, the number of candidates eager to establish their independence exceeds the number who are purely focused on pleasing the base. "Voters are looking for leaders who treat them like adults and tell them the truth," says Mike DuHaime, Christie's chief strategist. "They are rejecting politicians who tell everyone what they want to hear and speak only in cautious focus-grouped terms."

In some ways, the tell-it-like-it-is caucus is responding to Americans' well-documented dissatisfaction with the nation's institutions—and especially its elected officials.

"Most of these candidates understand that of the forces shaping the electorate, there is nothing more dominating than the utter collapse of trust between the American people and just about every institution you can think of," explains Steve Schmidt, McCain's former top strategist. "What they get is the macro-political climate in the country. They get the sour mood of the American people, the collapse of trust between most American institutions and the American people, and that they want a real leader."

"Folks hate Washington, D.C.; its polices, it's politics, it's attitude," adds New Hampshire-based GOP strategist Dave Carney. "We thirst for someone to treat us as adults, and be straight with us about the problems and challenges we face as a nation."

But that's not the only reason why Ted Cruz, whose Oval Office aspirations may hinge on winning the Iowa caucuses, called for an end to the ethanol subsidies that have long fattened local interests. Or why Bush told the Wall Street Journal last December that the next GOP nominee must be willing to "lose the primary to win the general without violating your principles."

"Folks will tell you in politics, 'don't talk about that subject,'" Christie said in New Hampshire this month, in a reference to raising the retirement age. "They call it the third rail of American politics. They say, 'don't touch it.' So we're not going to touch it. We're going to hug it."

The maverick shtick is popular because it can be good politics. Each of these campaigns has mapped their paths to the White House through New Hampshire, where style has always been as prized as substance. They know that truth-telling can be a recipe for media attention, and that presenting one's self as an agent of change can help establish a niche in a crowded field.

Their numbers are also growing as a side effect of new rules put in place after the 2012 race to shorten the primary calendar and limit the number of televised debates. The guidelines, imposed by the Republican National Committee to limit the damage inflicted on the eventual nominee, have had the unexpected effect of nationalizing the race. With more states voting early on, contests in places like Iowa and South Carolina become less vital to a candidate's chances. That saps the power of hardcore activists and hands more influence to moderate voters in bigger, more diverse states. And with national polling being the standard to get on stage at the all-important televised debates, candidates have to define themselves more. "Loud doesn't mean a lot," Graham says.

The would-be mavericks are also responding to a well-documented hunger for a virtuous statesman, as embodied by the cinematic archetypes of Frank Capra's Mr. Smith or Aaron Sorkin's Jed Barlet. Or even the real-life McCain, whose bull-shooting sessions with the press on the back of his bus are the stuff of political legend.

Still, it's a safe bet that political calculations will ultimately trump conscience. Graham's good friend McCain pandered on the Confederate flag in his 2000 campaign and tapped Sarah Palin as his running mate in 2008 when he needed to galvanize the base. And candidates of all stripes can cast the same old red-meat as telling uncomfortable truths that somehow only discomfort the other party.

"It remains to be seen," Schmidt says, "whether we're going to have truth-telling candidates rather than candidates using 'truth-telling' as a prop."

New Hampshire Poll: Sanders Inching Closer to Clinton, Bush Continues Leading GOP // Latin Post // Rodrigo Ugarte – June 27, 2015

New numbers out of New Hampshire show that many in the Granite State have started making up their minds about how they will vote for in the state's presidential primary. Hillary Clinton and Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), Democratic presidential hopefuls, are coming closer on the polls while Republicans struggle to shine.

A new WMUR/CNN poll shows Sen. Sanders is closing the gap between him and Clinton among Democratic primary voters. The poll, conducted by the University of New Hampshire, surveyed 1,010 people and among the likely Democratic primary voters Clinton still remained in the number one position with 43 percent believing she should be the party's first choice. However, Sen. Sanders was only eight points behind with 35 percent. None of the other Democratic candidates or potential candidates broke past 10 percent.

Sen. Sanders' rise in the polls could coincide with a continued importance on the economy among New Hampshire voters. Though it has declined in importance from 35 percent in February to 24 percent in June, the economy remains the top issue for New Hampshire Democratic primary voters.

Sen. Sanders has built his campaign on his views on economic inequality and reform in various areas of the country.

His favorability rating of 66 percent is even closer to Clinton's 74 percent and she also enjoys the rank of top unfavorable Democratic candidate with 11 percent. Yet, the former secretary of state continues to lead.

Among Republicans, however, the race remains uneven with Jeb Bush leading in the polls in the same survey. Sixteen percent of primary voters in the state opted to vote for Bush. The next choice was Donald Trump with 11 percent.

However, when asked about whom they favor the most, Bush had a 50 percent while Trump only 38 percent. Sen. Marco Rubio also from Florida came the closest to Bush with 49 percent but only six percent would vote for him if the primary election happened today.

The New Hampshire primary is the second in the country and it is slated to happen in early February 2016.

2 Charged in Confederate Flag Removal at South Carolina Capitol // NYT // Kenneth Rosen – June 27, 2015

A protester climbed a 30-foot flagpole and removed the Confederate battle flag from its perch outside the South Carolina State House early Saturday, before she was arrested and the flag replaced, the police said.

The protester, an African-American woman, was nearly halfway up the pole when a State Capitol police officer on routine patrol ordered her to come down. The authorities said the woman, who was wearing climbing gear, had ignored the command.

She continued her climb to the top of the flagpole and unhooked and removed the flag before descending.

An officer from the Bureau of Protective Services arrested her and a white male who had aided her.

The police identified the woman as Brittany Ann Byuarim-Newsome, 30, of Raleigh, N.C., and her purported accomplice as James Ian Tyson, 30, of Charlotte, N.C.

They were charged with defacing a monument, the police said, a misdemeanor that carries a fine of up to $5,000, a prison term of up to three years or both.

About the time she was being arrested, Ms. Byuarim-Newsome sent a statement to the news media via email. “We removed the flag today because we can’t wait any longer. We can’t continue like this another day,” the statement said. “It’s time for a new chapter where we are sincere about dismantling white supremacy and building toward true racial justice and equality.”

Some opponents of the flag argued that the protesters’ actions had created an opening to resolve a divisive issue.

“The flag is down now — we should keep it down,” Rashad Robinson, the executive director of ColorOfChange.org , an advocacy group, said in a statement.

But the flag in Columbia — which flies near the Confederate Monument on the grounds of the State House — is protected by state law. A new flag was hung within an hour after Saturday’s incident.

Around 10 a.m., about a dozen cars and trucks flying Confederate flags circled the State House in advance of a pro-Confederate flag rally at the monument. Protests against the Confederate battle flag and calls for it to be removed from public display have escalated since the June 17 killings of nine African-American churchgoers at the Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church in Charleston. Gov. Nikki R. Haley, a Republican, has called from the removal of the flag at the State House, but she said she needed the cooperation of the legislature. On Tuesday, South Carolina lawmakers agreed to allow discussion of the matter during the legislative session.

The man charged in the attack at the Emanuel A.M.E. Church, Dylann Roof, 21, posted photographs on social media and the Internet showing him posing with the Confederate flag. The police and prosecutors have said his attack was racially motivated and have accused him of a hate crime.

For Obama and Clinton, twisty paths to 'yes' on gay marriage // AP // Jim Kuhneman and Lisa Lerer – June 27, 2015

When President Barack Obama praised the Supreme Court's watershed same-sex marriage ruling, he held it up as evidence that a "shift in hearts and minds is possible."

Obama may well have been describing his own public trajectory on gay unions — a complicated path that took him through opposition and ambivalence to enthusiastic embrace.

His journey is not unlike the rest of America. But over the years he has worn his uncertainty on his sleeve, publicly musing about his stance before becoming a full-throated advocate for marriage and other aspects of gay rights.

"When all Americans are treated as equal, we are all more free," Obama declared Friday.

As far as political figures go, Obama's road to "yes" is hardly unique.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential campaign jumped on the Supreme Court decision, changing its red campaign logo to a rainbow colored H, releasing a gauzy video of gay wedding ceremonies, and blasting out supportive tweets aimed at building its campaign list.

In a fiery speech Friday night to Democratic activists in Northern Virginia, Clinton said that "love triumphed in the highest court" and declared: "We can sum up the message from the court and the American people in just two words: Move on."

But like Obama, such expressions of support mark a remarkable shift for Clinton, who opposed gay marriage for more than two decades as a first lady, a U.S. senator and a presidential candidate. Just three months ago, Clinton's position was that while she personally supported gay marriage the issue was best left for individual states to decide — a policy stance held by most of the Republican presidential field.

"It has been an evolutionary process," said Fred Sainz of the Human Rights Campaign, a national gay rights group. But he said Obama now stands as one of the great champions of gay rights, up there with the likes of Harvey Milk. As for Clinton, he said, "she connects with gay people on a level that is beyond explanation."

Obama has carefully staked out his position on same-sex marriage throughout his political career. During his 1996 Illinois state Senate race, he replied to a questionnaire from a gay newspaper in Chicago: "I favor legalizing same-sex marriages, and would fight efforts to prohibit such marriages." Two years later, he declared himself undecided.

By 2004, as he ran for the U.S. Senate, he said he opposed gay marriage for politically strategic reasons, saying Republicans would exploit the issue, and he advocated instead for gay civil unions. In his 2006 book, "The Audacity of Hope," he cited his own faith as a reason to oppose same-sex marriage, though he also wondered whether "in years hence I may be seen as someone who was on the wrong side of history."

He came out firmly for same-sex marriage in 2012 and called for it in his second inaugural address. But earlier this year, his former top strategist, David Axelrod, wrote that Obama had feigned opposition to gay marriage for most of his political career, grudgingly taking Axelrod's advice that African-American religious leaders and others would oppose him if he let it be known he supported gay marriage.

"If Obama's views were 'evolving' publicly, they were fully evolved behind closed doors," Axelrod wrote.

Obama disputed the account, telling BuzzFeed News that he thought civil unions were "a sufficient way of squaring the circle," but that "the pain and the sense of stigma that was being placed on same-sex couples who are friends of mine" changed his mind.

"I think the notion that somehow I was always in favor of marriage per se isn't quite accurate," Obama told BuzzFeed.

But even after he endorsed gay marriage, he took his time embracing other aspects of the gay community's agenda.

It wasn't until July 2014 that Obama gave employment protection to gay and transgender workers in the federal government and its contracting agencies.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Still, gay rights advocates hold him up as one of their biggest political advocates.

"It's absolutely right to note that this administration did not get off to a good start with LGBT advocates," Sainz said. "But the sheer volume of what he has done will be hard for another president to replicate, simply because so much of what he has done has been so incredibly powerful, momentous and life changing for LGBT people."

Clinton's path into the embrace of the gay community has been similar. She backed her husband's Defense of Marriage Act in 1996, described marriage between a man and a woman as a "fundamental bedrock principle" in a 2004 Senate floor speech, and dodged the question when asked in 2007 whether she agreed with Gen. Peter Pace, then the Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman, that homosexuality was immoral.

But as secretary of state, Clinton emerged as a champion of gay rights, declaring that "gay rights are human rights, and human rights are gay rights," at a 2011 conference in Geneva.

Sainz said that in Clinton, the LGBT community sees a kindred spirit. "It's in our DNA to support her," he said. "We have been forced to deal with some of lives greatest indignities and have come out on the other side."

Obama's Charleston eulogy: 'Amazing Grace' // CNN // Kevin Liptak – June 27, 2015

Charleston, South Carolina (CNN) President Barack Obama delivered a touching eulogy, a rousing political speech and a thoughtful meditation on race in America when he traveled to Charleston, South Carolina on Friday to speak at the funeral of the Rev. Clementa Pinckney, who was gunned down last week by a racist terrorist during Bible study.

But the President's speech will be remembered for a moment at the end when he launched into a solo of "Amazing Grace," that at first stunned the mourners and then brought them to their feet as they joined him in song.

"As a nation, out of this terrible tragedy, God has visited grace upon us for he has allowed us to see where we've been blind," Obama said. "He's given us the chance, where we've been lost, to find our best selves."

The President's remarks at times felt like a sermon, with organ chords backing him during some of the most impassioned passages. The mostly African-American crowd was, at the end of the eulogy, on its feet, clapping and cheering Obama as he named each victim of the church shooting and declaring each "had grace."

The President, first lady Michelle Obama, Vice President Joe Biden, a bipartisan host of high-level members of Congress and Hillary Clinton all attended the memorial service at TD Arena in downtown Charleston. Last Wednesday, a 21-year-old man opened fire at a Bible study inside Charleston's Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church, killing nine.

The shooter declared he was there to "kill black people," and an online manifesto attributed to him contained white supremacist screeds.

Obama, in his eulogy, said the killer likely assumed he "would deepen divisions that trace back to our nation's original sin."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"But God works in mysterious ways," Obama said. "God had different ideas. He didn't know he was being used by God."

"The alleged killer could have never anticipated the way the families of the fallen would respond when they saw him in court in the midst of unspeakable grief, with words of forgiveness," Obama said.

The country, he argued, has responded to the church shooting "with a thoughtful introspection and self-examination that we so rarely see in public life."

Friday's funeral service for Pinckney wasn't the first time Obama delivered a high-profile eulogy, and with a year and a half remaining in office, it may not be the last.

But on Friday, Obama's speech moved beyond just grief for the victims -- the President stepped directly into a national conversation about race in which he plays a central role.

He declared the Confederate flag a symbol of racial oppression, and praised the renewed urgency in removing it from the South Carolina State Capitol.

"Removing the flag from this state's capital would not be an act of political correctness," he said. "It would not an insult to the valor of Confederate soldiers. It would simply be acknowledgment that the cause for which they fought, the cause of slavery, was wrong."

Unlike past times Obama has confronted an act of violence, he knew the highest profile victim of the Charleston shooting personally. Obama met Pinckney as an early supporter of his 2008 presidential bid.

That personal connection differentiated Friday's eulogy from the funerals Obama keynoted after previous shootings. So, too, did the renewed questions on race spurred by the shooter's apparent motivations.

"None of us can or should expect a transformation in race relations overnight. Every time something like this happens, somebody says, 'We have to have a conversation about race,'" Obama said. "We talk a lot about race. There's no shortcut. We don't need more talk."

Prior to the eulogy, Obama himself used some of his bluntest language to date on race during an interview with comedian Marc Maron on Friday, saying that just because the N-word is no longer used frequently in public, "that's not the measure of whether racism still exists or not."

The moment was a distant cry from the earlier days of Obama's presidency, when he studiously avoided discussing race or the implications of his election to office.

At Friday's funeral, Obama called for greater attention to less apparent forms of racism.

"Maybe we now realize the way a racial bias can infect us even when we don't realize it so that we're guarding against not just racial slurs, but we're also guarding against the subtle impulse to call Johnny back for a job interview but not Jamal," he said.

Greece on the brink of default after talks with creditors break down // WaPo // Griff Witte – June 27, 2015

LONDON — Greece's long-running standoff with its European creditors appeared headed on Saturday for an abrupt — and potentially cataclysmic — ending as the continent's finance ministers rejected an emergency Greek request to help the cash-starved country meet a Tuesday deadline for paying back its debts.

The development, just hours after Greece's prime minister stunned the continent with plans to hold a nationwide referendum on Europe's latest proposals, makes it increasingly likely that Greece will default — and could soon crash out of the euro zone altogether.

Reflecting the newly dire outlook, people formed lines at ATMs across Greece, seizing on perhaps their last chance to withdraw their savings. Some went away empty-handed after the machines ran dry.

With speculation mounting that the banks may lack the funds to reopen Monday morning, European officials huddled behind closed doors to plot out how to contain the damage of a Greek financial meltdown. The Greek finance minister was pointedly excluded from those talks, which ended with a statement from the other 18 euro-zone countries urging Greek authorities to implement capital controls.

The statement also highlighted the safeguards that have been implemented to keep debt contagion from spreading to other vulnerable economies, suggesting that if Greece is forced to abandon the euro, the collateral damage may be limited. But because no country has left the euro zone in its 16-year history, no one knows just how extensive the impact may be.

The collapse of negotiations on Saturday was the most ominous turn in a process that has been poisoned from the start by bitter mistrust between Greece's radical leftist government and the austerity-minded heavyweights who set policy in Europe.

Although both sides have repeatedly expressed a determination to keep Greece inside the common currency — and to avoid at all costs an uncontrollable and potentially disastrous default — that shared aspiration has not been enough to bridge the substantial divide.

As has become customary, each on Saturday blamed the other for the breakdown.

Greek Finance Minister Yanis Varoufakis called Saturday "a sad day for Europe" and said its decision to reject his request to extend Greece's bailout for several more weeks "will certainly damage the credibility of the euro group as a democratic union."

European officials countered that Greek Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras had blindsided them by calling a referendum early Sunday on a proposal that was still being negotiated, a move that effectively torpedoed any chance for a deal.

"The negotiations are clearly ended, if I understand Mr. Tsipras correctly," said German Finance Minister Wolfgang Schäuble as the continent's top finance officials gathered for their fifth emergency meeting in the past two weeks. "We have no grounds for further discussions."

Varoufakis later challenged European leaders to come back with a new proposal and signaled an openness to further talks. But the acrimony with which talks ended Saturday suggested that a return to the negotiating table is highly unlikely before two critical tests in the week ahead.

The first will come Monday, when Greek banks that have grown ever more reliant on emergency loans from the European Central Bank face the prospect of reopening for business without new lifelines.

The second will be Tuesday, when a $1.7 billion payment to the International Monetary Fund comes due. The IMF has repeatedly said it will not offer an extension on that deadline. Greek officials, meanwhile, say they do not have the money to make the payment unless the country's creditors unlock $8 billion in bailout funds that have been frozen as the negotiations have stalled.

Tsipras has set the referendum for July 5, although it is unclear exactly what Greek voters will be deciding. In announcing the vote, Tsipras said he wanted to give the Greek people the chance to vote on the latest proposal by Greece's creditors, which he attacked as "an ultimatum" that would place "unbearable new burdens on the Greek people."

But with Greece sliding toward default and a possible break with the euro zone, there is no guarantee that the offer will remain viable by the time of the referendum, even if Greece does vote "yes."

The European Central Bank, the European Commission and the IMF have together provided Greece with $264 billion in bailouts over the past five years as the country has reckoned with sky-high debts.

After years of withering austerity policies imposed by European paymasters as a condition of those deals, Greece in January rejected the medicine and elected Syriza, a radical leftist party that promised to tear up the old agreements and start anew.

Greece has repeatedly demanded that Europe reduce the nation's debt load and ease up on austerity, which officials say has devastated the economy and sent unemployment rocketing to 25 percent. But European officials have been unwilling to hand Syriza a victory and have insisted that the country keep to strict targets for belt-tightening.

The past week began with rare optimism, as Greece submitted proposals that European officials initially welcomed as a significant step forward after months of deadlock. But by Wednesday, the creditors had submitted counterproposals for slashing pensions and cutting spending. Greek officials rejected them, saying they would cross the government's red lines.

During debate in the Greek Parliament on Saturday over whether the referendum should go ahead, Tsipras was given a standing ovation from supporters who cheered his defiance of European authorities. But opposition leaders and others accused him of recklessly endangering the country's place in Europe.

"The nation's most vital interests demand that the country remains at the heart of Europe. The E.U.'s actual shortcomings do not, in any way, negate this," said former prime minister Costas Karamanlis, who spoke out after a long silence. "Foolish choices that undermine this principle push the country to adventures, with unpredictable and possibly irreversible consequences."

ISIS bomb plot on London military parade foiled, nation remains on high alert // New York Daily News // Dennis Slattery – June 27, 2015

British security forces were on high alert Saturday at events marking Armed Forces Day following reports that officials foiled an ISIS bomb plot on a military parade in London, officials said.

Police foiled an attack on a London military parade Saturday after an undercover reporter who obtained details on the plot alerted counterterrorism officials, The Sun newspaper reported.

The plot included the use of pressure-cooker devices, similar to those used during the deadly attacks on the Boston Marathon in 2013.

Prime Minister David Cameron told reporters "heightened security" would be deployed at events paying tribute to Britain's military in response to the report.

Police said they were also beefing up security for the annual gay pride parade in London on Saturday.

Britain's terrorism threat remains at "severe," meaning an attack is considered highly likely.

The number of domestic terrorism-related arrests increased by about one-third in 2014, as police try to halt those joining Islamic extremists in Syria.

About 700 Britons are believed to have left the country to join militants.

The announcement followed bloody attacks in Tunisia, France and Kuwait on Friday.

At least 15 Britons were among the 39 people — mostly tourists — who were killed when a gunman attacked a Tunisian beach resort on Friday.

Gay Marriage Is American As Apple Pie // Daily Beast // Gil Troy – June 27, 2015

Even before the Supreme Court decided on Friday in Obergefell v. Hodges that same-sex marriage rights were universal, the popular verdict was in: gay marriage—and gay life—had become as American as apple pie.

Two years ago, in June 2013 the Supreme Court refused to limit the words "marriage" and "spouse" to heterosexual unions, invalidating the Defense of Marriage Act. That November, the Senate passed ENDA, the Employment Nondiscrimination Act banning anti-gay discrimination in the workplace 64 to 32—including 10 Republican votes, although the House of Representative has yet to pass it. Until recently,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrats often opposed gay marriage publicly, even while approving it privately; now, Republicans are increasingly supporting gay marriage publicly—or dodging the issue Chris Christie style—even while disapproving it privately. This reversal in what constitutes the politically safe position on gays probably represents America's fastest, sharpest U-turn on a fundamental social issue since the 1960s.

Twenty-two years ago, when the last Democratic president, Bill Clinton, admitted he approved of gays serving in the military, the resulting firestorm ultimately imposed "Don't ask, don't tell." Despite the Democratic majority in Congress, only 69 House members signed a letter supporting gay rights. Three years later in 1996, Clinton wooed the center by signing the Defense of Marriage Act, whose key provision many Clinton nominees to the Supreme Court eventually gutted in U.S. v. Windsor (2013) as placing an unfair "stigma" on gay spouses. As of January 2004 gay marriage was illegal in all 50 states.

Even as recently as seven years ago, when Barack Obama's presidency began, gays were weaker politically. Obama's 2008 campaign triggered a surge of socially conservative black and Hispanic voters who helped pass California's Proposition 8 banning same sex marriage. With many blacks—and Democrats—still opposing civil unions, Obama had not endorsed gay marriage. As president, he only approved same sex marriage on May 9, 2012, thanks to Vice President Joe Biden's blurting out his own endorsement days earlier on "Meet the Press."

What John Adams would have labeled a revolution "in the minds and hearts of the people," has been rapid and radical. Since Thomas Jefferson's wonderfully subversive phrase in the Declaration of Independence proclaiming "all men are created equal," gradually, "all" broadened to include blacks, gays and others. "Men" expanded to include women; even the notion of "equal" grew.

Those seeking to create a heroic history of gay liberation emphasize the Stonewall protests of 1969, along with four decades' worth of protests producing legislative and legal victories. But in fact, a mass cultural conversion precipitated this political change.

While rooted in the Sixties' sexual revolution and the Seventies' "Me Decade," this cultural revolution went national in the 1980s. Ironically, the AIDS tragedy helped mainstream gay life. Many gays became more open about their lifestyles, while many heterosexuals became more aware of gays around them, especially after the disease killed President Ronald Reagan's friend, the Hollywood legend Rock Hudson, in 1985.

In the 1990s, despite the complex politics handcuffing Clinton, Hollywood propagandized effectively for gay equality. Movie blockbusters like Philadelphia starring Tom Hanks and Denzel Washington, and The Birdcage, starring Robin Williams and Gene Hackman, cast in celluloid the dominant Hollywood stereotype of gays as normal, respectable, family-loving Americans underneath whatever flamboyant facades some might choose—with conservative opponents cast as Neanderthals awaiting redemption. A year later, the comedienne Ellen DeGeneres came out of the closet on The Oprah Winfrey Show. With art first imitating, then shaping, life, DeGeneres's popular sitcom character "Ellen" subsequently came out to her therapist, played by Oprah Winfrey.

Will and Grace debuted in 1998 introducing Will Truman, an openly-gay lawyer sporting an all-American name and a conservative personality. By 2005, the American public proved surprisingly open to a sexually explicit macho males' love story in Brokeback Mountain. Movies and television had not only normalized what most once deemed abnormal, they glamorized what most once deemed repulsive.

As with the Reagan years, the George W. Bush years proved surprisingly good for gays in their march to social and political acceptance. Mary Cheney's lesbianism was not that scandalous, and actually softened the George W. Bush-Dick Cheney image. When Bush's former Republican National Committee chair, Ken Mehlman, came out in 2010, many emphasized the shocking fact that few were shocked.

Cheney's and Mehlman's outsider-as-insider stories, paralleling millions of others' paths, reveal gays' power as both an invisible minority and as the privileged oppressed. Like Jews, gays frequently pass easily in society, often asserting their distinct identity as they please. It becomes hard to hate "them" when "they" are "us."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And, like women, many gays sit at the most elite familial, corporate and governmental tables in the land, giving them the exclusive access long denied to African-Americans and other minorities. This growing intimacy, familiarity, and prominence, with millions coming out to relatives and colleagues, set the stage for this decade's political and legal changes. Before Friday, 37 states and Washington, D.C., allowed same-sex marriages.

Ironically—but cleverly—gays changed their collective image by embracing marriage during an epidemic of heterosexual divorce. Emphasizing their conventionality and familiarity, rather than flamboyance and rebelliousness, gays have framed equal treatment as a civil rights issue, appealing to an increasingly fluid and tolerant society that worships individual rights and abhors discrimination.

The late Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan taught that: "The central conservative truth is that it is culture, not politics that determines the success of a society. The central liberal truth is that politics can change a culture and save it from itself." This time, cultural transformation triggered liberal change. Especially in today's horizontal democracy, culture matters, ideas count, media transforms—and sometimes, politics and the law just catch up.

The monuments to the framers of The Southern Manifesto of 1956 // American Thinker – June 27, 2015

As Confederate flags come down, so should the monuments that honor the Democrat politicians who overwhelmingly supported The Southern Manifesto of 1956.

The Southern Manifesto – officially entitled The Decision of the Supreme Court in the School Cases Declaration of Constitutional Principles – was signed by 101 members of the U.S. Congress, including 19 senators and 82 members of the House of Representatives. Ninety-nine of them were Democrats.

All 19 Senate signatories were Democrats: Walter F. George, Richard B. Russell, John Stennis, Sam J. Ervin, Jr., Strom Thurmond, Harry F. Byrd, A. Willis Robertson, John L. McClellan, Allen J. Ellender, Russell B. Long, Lister Hill, James O. Eastland, W. Kerr Scott, John Sparkman, Olin D. Johnston, Price Daniel, J.W. Fulbright, George A. Smathers, Spessard L. Holland.

The Manifesto was entered into the Congressional Record, 84th Congress, Second Session, Vol. 102, Part 4, on March 12, 1956, as a response to the 1954 Supreme Court ruling in Brown v. Board of Education.

It included this language:

This unwarranted exercise of power by the Court, contrary to the Constitution, is creating chaos and confusion in the States principally affected. It is destroying the amicable relations between the white and Negro races that have been created through 90 years of patient effort by the good people of both races. It has planted hatred and suspicion where there has been heretofore friendship and understanding.

The effort underway today to shame the display of the Confederate flag should be rightly accompanied by a removal of the monuments to those national politicians who, 60 years ago, claimed that "amicable relations between the white and Negro races" was being perpetuated by separate but equal educational opportunities.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Those monuments include statues of Senator J. William Fulbright (who received the Presidential Medal of Freedom Award from President William Jefferson Clinton)…

…West Virginia senator (and former Ku Klux Klansman) Robert C. Byrd…

…South Carolina senator Sam Irwin…

…South Carolina senator Strom Thurmond, drafter of the original version of the Manifesto…

…and Louisiana senator Russell B. Long, son of Louisiana governor and U.S. senator Huey Long.a

If there is no honor in the memories evoked by the Confederate flag, then there is even less to be found in the statues depicting those prominent politicians who fought for segregation well into the 20th century.

Clinton supports universal background checks // Des Moines Register // Sarah Mannheimer – June 27, 2015

Late last year, three Des Moines-area schools went into lockdown on the same morning after separate shooting incidents in our area. My 5-year-old daughter asked me why she had to hide under her desk. I couldn't bring myself to tell her. I refuse to teach my children to live in fear.

Recently a young woman was gunned down at the Coral Ridge Mall near Iowa City. And of course, last week, nine people were massacred at their church in Charleston, S.C. It doesn't end there; 88 people lose their lives to gun violence every day in this country, many of them women and children.

Last week, Hillary Clinton asked the most urgent question facing our country, "How many people do we need to see cut down before we act?" Hillary supports universal background checks to keep weapons out of the hands of domestic abusers, violent felons, and those suffering from mental illness. Hillary Clinton is willing to fight for a future free from gun violence. Are you?

I'm calling on all candidates to follow Hillary's lead. I'm calling on responsible gun owners to take a stand. I'm calling on Iowans to recognize that gun violence affects every community. Together we can keep our schools, churches and workplaces safe. Hillary Clinton is right. It is time to act.

Clean Water Action

Dear Mary,

Polluters and their allies in the Senate are at it again – putting the drinking water for millions of Americans at risk. We need you to help us stop them today. You can give our teams the resources they need to mobilize Clean Water Action members and concerned Americans just like you with a gift of $25 today.

We've been pushing the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) for nearly four years to protect the streams and wetlands that provide the drinking water for nearly 117 million Americans. EPA is nearly done, but Senators like John Barrasso (R-WY) and Rand Paul (R-KY) are working behind the scenes to stop this vital progress. Senator Paul is even trying to take protections away from more of the streams we fish from and swim in, and more of the wetlands that protect us from floods.

Your support will send them a message today. Join our fight with a special gift and tell these Senators that we need to protect all our streams, not fewer of them!

If it seems like you've heard this all before, it's because you have. Senator Barrasso and his anti-environment colleagues have tried to stop EPA from finishing this important work for years. Time after time, these Senators introduce bills to weaken protections and time after time--and time after time, we've stopped them – with you at our side. Take a moment to tell polluters and their allies in the Senate that "enough is enough" – make a gift to fight back today !

For clean water,

Bob Wendelgass, President & CEO

Subject:	Clinton Foundation News & Guidance: Donor Update

Today, the Clinton Foundation updated its donor posting with contributors who gave in the third quarter of 2015, which included CGI's Annual Meeting. We wanted to make sure you were aware and had information about today's news. We were pleased with the results this quarter, because:

- Total amount donated to the Clinton Foundation in the first three quarters of 2015 is higher than the same period in 2014.
- The number of donors is higher compared to the first three quarters of 2014.
- Consistent with previous years and the first two quarters of 2015, approximately 90 percent of donations were $100 or less.
- CGI sponsorship revenue rose in 2015, with 33 new and returning sponsors. These include Procter & Gamble, The Coca-Cola Co., Microsoft, Goldman Sachs, Cisco, the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, the Ford Foundation, Gap Inc., NRG Energy, Swiss Reinsurance Co., the Rockefeller Foundation and Western Union.
- Membership in CGI is strong, with 16 of the 30 companies in the Dow Jones industrial average part of CGI. First-time CGI members this year included Apple, Cardinal Health, Xerox and Zurich Insurance.

Donna Shalala posted a retrospective of the Foundation's work this past quarter on the Clinton Foundation blog:

> "The Clinton Foundation has a strong commitment to transparency and accountability. In fact, we take measures that make us one of the most transparent nonprofits in the world—including disclosing all of our donors on a quarterly basis. We released the latest update just today."

> "Compared to this time last year, donations are up—both in terms of the amount donated and the number of donors. And, as was the case in previous years, about 90 percent of donations were in the amount of $100 or less."

Last month, Bob Harrison, the CEO of the Clinton Global Initiative, wrote an op-ed about how support for CGI has strengthened:

> "Despite our mission, some have characterized the turnover of a handful of CGI's sponsors as 'trouble' for CGI and 'abandoning' the Clintons, but this is just another example of critics trying to politicize philanthropy, and the facts don't bear out the argument."

> "At CGI, corporations not only provide funding, but also apply their expertise in management, technology, manufacturing, distribution and research to help non-governmental organizations and foundations be more effective. These corporate commitments are providing better access to education and healthcare in the developing world, creating jobs and improving infrastructure in the U.S, and protecting the environment."

And yesterday, the Chronicle of Philanthropy reported on the Foundation's hiring of Kevin Thurm as the new Chief Operating Officer:

> "Kevin Thurm will serve as executive vice president and chief operating officer, Ms. Shalala said in a message to foundation staff. He will focus on strategy, day-to-day operations, and the Clinton Foundation's administrative units. He will report directly to Ms. Shalala."

> "'Kevin has been a trusted colleague and partner since he served as my chief of staff and then deputy secretary for HHS in the '90s, where he oversaw major policy and management issues, including the implementation of legislative initiatives like the Government Performance and Results Act and challenges like the 'Y2K' computer programming situation,' Ms. Shalala said, referring to the fear in 1999 of a breakdown in important communications when computers switched to 2000."

The support to the Clinton Foundation has enabled specific programs to expand their work and reach even more individuals across the globe. Over the past three months, we have seen many examples of this work in the news:

An Associated Press article looked at Commitments to Action that came out of CGI's Annual Meeting, profiled the unique commitment model. The piece cites several commitments, including:

> "One such pledge has led to financial education for more than 1.2 million poor women and youths and scholarships for more than 10,000 students in Kenya. Another has spawned more than 430 successful online crowdfunding campaigns for projects centered on women and girls. A third, aimed at enlisting African-American churches in combatting HIV and AIDS, has trained more than 500 religious leaders."
> "We're in the middle of defining the terms of our interdependence in a world where so much of our identity is caught up in our differences," Bill Clinton said. "So our job, as citizens — those of us who have no political power — is to do what we can to build up the positive forces of our interdependence and reduce the negative ones."

In September, the Atlantic wrote about the importance of closing the word gap not only to resolve education consequences, but also to improve health outcomes saying, "Children with more words do better in school. Adults who were good students and earned a college degree have longer life expectancies." The article sites Too Small to Fail's "Talking is Teaching" campaign as one of the organizations focusing on this issue.

> "There are certainly people watching, from state health officers in California and Indiana to academics at the University of Kansas. The White House has issued a 'call to action' to reduce the word gap, spotlighting the Georgia program specifically. And the Clinton Foundation has launched 'Talking is Teaching' through its early childhood Too Small to Fail campaign."

At the beginning of September, Reuters published an article about climate change's effects on island nations and how the Clinton Climate Initiative's Islands Energy Program is helping to develop sustainable, renewable energy solutions.

> "Dymphna van der Lans, CEO of the Clinton Climate Initiative (CCI), which is working with around a dozen Caribbean and East African island nations to develop and roll out renewable energy strategies, said there was both a moral and economic imperative for such states to transition away from costly diesel imports."

In August, Refinery29 posted a story about the Clinton Foundation's recent trip to Haiti, where they got a firsthand look at our work there and what we're doing to empower girls and women.

> "I think there is such a case for optimism about Haiti," Chelsea says. "And also really about what women can do when we're truly unfettered." These female entrepreneurs strive for success not because it will bring them wealth or fame, but because with steady employment, they're able to economically support not just their families but also other women as well.

In August, Forbes wrote about how the Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership is working with CropConnect Enterprises to streamline the farming process in India. This partnership empowers farmers and reduces agricultural waste.

> *"Partnering with former president Bill Clinton and Canadian philanthropist Frank Giustra's Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership, [CropConnect Enterprises] is currently working to create joint platform across India's often ignored northeastern states. Main Topics: McCain's Oil Drilling Solution, McCain Courts The Females, Carly Makes the Rounds

Summary of Shift: Al Gore endorsement of Barack Obama was still a major focus of the morning news. As was the severe flooding that is currently ravaging the Mid-West. The Mississippi River continues to swell and overwhelm several levy systems causing mass flooding and devastation. New Orleans levy's are also still at risk. Floods in China have also wiped out small villages, already devastated by last month's earthquake, causing hundreds of deaths so far. Gay and lesbian couples in California have finally started being issued marriage licenses, and the presidential candidates positions on gay marriage was then covered. Tiger Woods epic battle to win the USOpen was featured heavily, as was a new study linking drinking coffee to fighting heart disease. Tim Russert's wake and funeral are taking place in DC today and tomorrow.
The Taliban have seized control of several villages and continue their uprising against the Afghani Government, after their high-scale prison break. Karzai has promised to send in more troops. McCain's attacks on Obama's Iraq stance and calls for him to visit the area and meet with the commanders on the ground were scrutinized, especially now that Obama has announced his upcoming trip there. Some wonder if he is playing into McCain's hand. The recent polls showing the gender gap continue to be a focus for commentary by surrogates from both parties. Carly Fiorina made the rounds, speaking on several stations about McCain's push for Hillary Clinton supporters. McCain's new plan and upcoming speech on new oil drilling was also featured.

Carly Fiorina Talks About Oil Drilling and Women Voters For McCain (CNN 06/17/08 7:26am)
JOHN ROBERTS: John McCain now saying that he supports offshore drilling, to find more U.S. oil. Right now there's a federal ban in place that stops states that might want to, from allowing oil drilling. Will it set up a battle in some key swing states this election year? Here to talk about that and McCain's efforts to gain more women voters is Carly Fiorina. She's the senior advisor for the McCain campaign, also the former CEO and chairwoman of HewlettPackard.

[...]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Tell me a little bit about this proposal senator McCain will issue later on today to lift the federal moratorium on offshore drilling. Critics are saying it's not much more than an outreach for contributions from the oil and gas industry and maybe to try to take a swing at voters in Virginia, a state considering offshore drilling if it had the authority to do so.

CARLY FIORINA: John McCain begins a serious of conversations today with the American people about our energy crisis. He will talk as well about what it will take to achieve energy independence. John McCain first began talking about this subject about a year ago. Since then it's important to remember the price of oil has doubled in just a year. So clearly these are extraordinary times. He is proposing both a series of short term and long term measures. To your specific question, yes. He's calling for a lifting of the ban on offshore, off continental shelf drilling. It will still be up to the states to decide whether they will permit such drilling. Obviously this is a time now where we need to tap all of our own reserves of oil, natural gas, coal. He proposes basic research into clean coal. We need more sources of energy of our own.

ROBERTS: Some polls are suggesting that the majority of Americans may support a proposal to increase offshore drilling on the coast of the United States. But this proposal would also put him at odds with environmentalists who say it flies in the face of his plans to curb global warming. The real rich prize here in all of this, Florida. Governor Kris is well opposed, and environmentalists in the state of Florida are very much opposed to offshore drilling there. Could he ever get this through?

FIORINA: Ultimately, of course, as I said it will be up to the states to decide. Florida will have a decision to make. It's also important to remember that McCain has consistently said that the U.S. must take a lead in curbing global warming. It is why, despite his call for the lifting of this ban, he also will repeat today once again that he believes we must preserve pristine wildernesses like ANWR, like the grand canyon. He does not propose drilling there. Again, this is a time now where we are in foreign debt paying for foreign oil where the price of gas goes up every day. And so in addition to short-term solutions like the gas tax holiday which he has proposed for several months now, he also wants to talk to the American people about the longer-term solutions. Which are mining our own energy more effectively. But also turning to green technologies, nuclear power, all of those things that will help us achieve independence from foreign oil.

ROBERTS: Let me switch gears here a little bit. There's a battle raging on the campaign trail for disaffected Hillary Clinton supporters. You're involved in this outreach, you were on a conference call with John McCain other the weekend. Barack Obama is taking aim at this outreach to women saying quote about Senator McCain, "he has opposed equal pay, he has opposed the chip that's the health care program that would make children insured, he opposed efforts to protect women against some of the discrimination that they experience in the workplace," now that's not going to be a track record that's going to be very appealing to women. How do you respond?

FIORINA: Well first I think, John McCain has a very particular view about the role of government and he doesn't believe government should be regulating pay. Although, he certainly agrees that women need to be treated equally in the workplace. But very specifically, what I would say is this. No one should be taking the women's vote for granted. They represent 52% of the voting public. They start small businesses at twice the rate as men, the small businesses is the engine growth in this economy. So what John McCain is talking to women about is the fact that they are an economic and political force. He wants to talk to them about issues that matter to their pocketbooks. They manage the family budget, for example.

ROBERTS: But according to recent polls Senator Obama has got a huge advantage in women voters. As much as 13% in some polls.

FIORINA: That lays out the challenge for us to make sure that women understand who John McCain is. What he stands for. And the reality is, that I have met many many women across this country who are very open-minded and eager to understand John McCain. I think that represents a huge opportunity for us. I think we'll narrow that gap considerably.

Scarborough Hits Fiorina on McCain's Tax Cuts Flip-Flop (MSNBC 06/17/08 7:52am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: Now let's bring in somebody on the straight talk express. McCain economic adviser Carly

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fiorina. Carly, has the straight talk express gone into the ditch like Barack Obama suggests?

CARLY FIORINA: Well, ou know, it's a great laugh line but it just isn't true. I think it's once again an ample of rhetoric not matching the reality. John McCain has a long track record of putting his country before his party. He has a long track record of standing up to his party and President Bush, when necessary. And that's no more clearer than on the subject of energy independence, which he will talk about today and begin a substantive dialogue with the American people on that all important subject.

SCARBOROUGH: Let's talk about taxes, though. Early in the Bush administration John McCain was one of only two republicans who voted against the Bush tax cut. He said America couldn't afford it and it was, in effect, tax cuts for the rich. Now, as we go into this campaign, that's going to be one of his top issues. He wants to renew George Bush's tax cut. That's not straight talk, is it?

FIRORINA: Actually, it is straight talk because he was absolutely right, which he usually is. We couldn't afford those tax cuts. . .when they were passed the first time. And that's because he said at the time that tax cuts must be coupled with a reduction in government spending. This Republican president, George Bush, and a Republican congress, have presided over a 55% increase in the size of domestic government spending in the last seven years.

SCARBOROUGH: Exactly. Carly—

FIORINA: That's out of control government.

SCARBOROUGH: Carly, hold on one second though. When those tax cuts were passed we had a balanced budget. We were coming off a $150 billion surplus. This year in 2008, we're going to run the biggest deficit in the history of America.

FIORINA: That's right.

SCARBOROUGH: Now it's time to cut taxes? If we couldn't afford tax cuts in 2002 we sure as hell can't afford them in 2008, can we?

FIORINA: Well, I actually disagree. Our economy is in difficulty. Now is not the time to raise taxes. 23 million small businesses file taxes as individuals. Those 23 small businesses would see the largest tax increase in American history. It is absolutely essential that spending in Washington be reformed, which John McCain will do, and John McCain will be able to balance the budget by the end of his first term. But let me just say—

SCARBOROUGH: H-how will he do that?

FIORINA: --it is Barack Obama who is proposing to raise taxes of every conceivable type. He admitted as much when he said the other day, well, maybe I would postpone my tax increases because they might harm the economy. And he's will said that all of his spending proposals are paid for. The only way that's possible is if he is raising taxes by a huge margin.

SCARBOROUGH: I want to talk ab—

FIORINA: --the way we're going to balance the budget is to grow the economy as well as reduce federal government spending.

SCARBOROUGH: We've been talking about Barack Obama and how his numbers don't add up all morning. He wants to increase spending and he also wants to cut corporate taxes. Let's go back to John McCain. And I really want to lean in on this issue because I just want to understand where Senator McCain is coming from and where you're coming from this morning. You said John McCain was against tax cuts in 2002 and he was right to be against tax cuts in 2002 because we couldn't afford them, because they weren't spending cuts.

FIORINA: That's right.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SCARBOROUGH: Now you just said after six or seven years of some of the biggest, most wasteful spending in American history, now John McCain says, with a largest deficit in American history, probably coming in 2008, now you're saying we can afford those tax cuts? Spending is worse than it's ever been in American history.

FIORINA: What he is saying is two things. One, to repeal those tax cuts now would be in essence to levee the single largest tax increase in American history. You do not increase—

SCARBOROUGH: We can't afford it, can we?

FIORINA: Joe, let me just finish my sentence. Uh, you do not increase taxes when the economy is in grave difficulty. But he has also very quickly said that we must absolutely reduce federal spending. And he would propose to do that in a couple of very specific ways. One, he would put a freeze on all increases and discretionary spending over the next year. Two, he would review every single federal government program and post that on the internet for every American citizen to see. Three, he would veto absolutely every bill that had wasteful pork barrel spending on it. All of those bills, by the way, Barack Obama supported, whether it was the Farm Bill, whether it was the 2005 energy bill that Dick Cheney and President Bush supported. Only John McCain stood up and said, no. You're right. It's absolutely essential that we cut government spending. But the one man who knows how to do that is John McCain. But what we don't do increase taxes when our economy is going through a very difficult time.

SCARBOROUGH: Certainly, if he does those three things that you said he did, wanted to do, freezing discretionary spending and putting all of these wasteful programs up on the internet, he certainly will be doing something that George Bush hasn't done over the past six, seven years.

FIORINA: Absolutely.

SCARBOROUGH: And also something that John McCain has been one of the few Republicans in Washington that has been a champion, at least a fiscal restraint on the spending side.

McCain Aggressively Courting Women Voters, But Does He Even Have a Chance? (CNN 6/17/08 6:25am)
JOHN ROBERTS: The battle for women voters on the most politics in the morning. John McCain might not be wearing a pant suit but he is trying to peel off disaffected supporters of Hillary Clinton. It's looking like it might be a tough go for McCain though. A recent Gallup tracking poll shows Barack Obama with a 13 percent advantage among women voters. So are women a lock for Obama? Let's ask Patricia Murphy.

[…]

So, John McCain actively courting Hillary Clinton supporters. But let's listen to a little of what he said in his appeal.

[McCain Clip Shown]

So there you go, the active outreach. Does McCain have any kind of a chance with these hard lined Hillary supporters? What are you hearing from them on your website?

PATRICIA MURPHY: Well, I think he has a chance with some of them. There has been some recent polling that most of those Hillary Clinton supporters, about 60 percent of them, have already decided to go for Barack Obama. But among that 40 percent that's left, we got about 20 percent I think that John McCain does have a shot with. 20 percent of those women are probably going to go off with Barack Obama eventually because he's so similar to Hillary Clinton on policy issues. But a lot of women that I'm hearing from, and I get emails from them all the time, are saying that either Barack Obama doesn't have the experience to be president, Hillary Clinton did, John McCain is their next choice. And the rest of them are just worried about how it all ended for Hillary Clinton, they are still very disappointed, they may go over to Obama but they're very open to supporting John McCain.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The women who are still open to John McCain are still the ones who think that experience is more important than someone who's going to bring change.

JOHN ROBERTS: On that point, Barack Obama is ridiculing John McCain's outreach to these women, saying that he's wrong on every issue that matters to women voters. But, among white women at least, as we saw during the primaries, Barack Obama ran into some trouble. Hillary Clinton won white women running away. Does he have some work to do to court that very very important voting block this November?

MURPHY: He does, he has some work to do. He's very lucky he has a lot of women's groups who are helping him to do that. And they are that the more that women know about John McCain and his record, particularly on abortion and Roe v. Wade, that they will come over to Barack Obama rather than John McCain. But I will say, just because a candidate is pro-life doesn't mean they couldn't win the women's vote. Reagan won the women's vote both times and George H. Bush won the vote. So John McCain has an opening.

McCain's Edge and Weaknesses (Women, Hispanics, Age) Examined (ABC 06/17/08 7:05)
DIANE SAWYER: We heard what Senator Obama had to say about that, just 6 point spread between Senator McCain. What's the reason for this? Closer than it should be?

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS: It is closer than it should be, Diane, because if you look at some other numbers, the fact that President Bush is at a record low approval rating, the fact that 84 percent of the country thinks that we're going in the wrong direction. That should indicate that Barack Obama should be farther ahead, but if you look at the key question of experience that may be what's holding him back. Only 50 percent of voters say that he has the experience to be president. A full 46 percent say no, he doesn't have the experience. They're going to have to work on that, that's one of the reasons they're going on these foreign trips. There also seems to be an age factor here, Diane. Barack Obama winning big with under 30 voters. Voters under the age of 30, 2-to-1, 63 to 30 but he is losing voters that are 65 and older. He is losing them by about 12 points. And it's the older voters who are the most reliable voters, the ones who are most certain to vote in November.

SAWYER: That's right. Those are the one's you can count on to show up at the polls. Traditionally, anyway. Which means, I guess, the battleground are middle-aged voters and of course, what about the independents?

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let's take a look at those numbers. You look at those two groups, and you got a dead heat going on right now. Voters, aged 30-64, those middle of the road, independent voters, they're breaking right down the middle. This is going to be a key battleground for both campaigns in to November. You know, Jake's up in Detroit up in Michigan, I'm here in Ohio this morning. I think you can look to this election to be fought over middle-aged, middle of the road politically voters, right here in the middle of the country.

SAWYER: Now Senator Clinton's voters, we've all been asking over the past month, are they going to stick with the democratic party or not? What did we learn from the poll? I know Hispanics, surprisingly went to Obama fairly heavily. But what about the rest?

STEPHANOPOULOS: Big time, Hispanics going 7-to-2 for Barack Obama. But Senator Clinton supporters are still holding back a little bit. You got about a 1⁄4 of Senator Clinton supporters now saying that they're going to vote for John McCain. If that number stays that high it's going to be difficult for Barack Obama to win. Here's another danger sign for Obama. He is losing married white women. Married white women to John McCain by 20 points. Now, George W. Bush won married white women as well but this is a huge gap that Obama has to close if he's going to do well. And I noticed in J. Tapper's interview there that Senator Obama is hitting on things like this children's health program like the issue of choice, that was designed to target these women voters.

SAWYER: And finally, the issue of race and age, the two sort-of enflamed categories out there.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So far race doesn't seem to play a huge factor, in this race Diane. 23 percent of voters say that it's a factor, but they split pretty evenly between Obama and McCain. Age is a much bigger factor, 40 percent of the voters are saying they care about age and of those 40 percent they break very heavily by more than 20 points for Barack Obama over John McCain.

Richard Haass Discusses the Difficulty of Labeling the Surge as Effective or Ineffective (MSNBC 06/17/08 7:22am)

RICHARD HAASS: [No matter] who's the next president, we are going to gradually dial down our prescience but we're not going to withdraw . . . we're going to have withdrawals . . . where we'll cut back troops. But the United States is going to be in Iraq at a gradually reducing level for years to come.

JOE SCARBOROUGH: You know, we look at these stories and it's very easy to say: President Bush's surge worked. But there's actually an article in a recent Foreign Affairs that said it didn't work. That it's actually encouraging all the bad things to move forward.

HAASS: I think what the surge did is it recognized the principal reality: you've got to get the security situation right. . . and what mattered was less than increase in troops than the change in strategy . . .it wasn't the only thing . . . but it was one important thing.

SCARBOROUGH: You and Fareed Zakaria wrote about the United States standing in the world. It sounds like 1973 or 1979 all over again. People talking about how . . . the sun is setting . . . is a long term existence in Iraq, Afghanistan . . . is that a great threat to the United States. . . ? Are we being bled dry?

HAASS: No. We will be in places for years to come and we need to be. . . what we've gotta do is get our political and economic foundations right . . . we've got to reduce some of our military presence, we can't stay large everywhere but there's no way the United States can withdraw from the world . . .

SCARBOROUGH: But there's no way we can stay in Iraq with a 150,000 troops.

HAASS: And we won't. We should and we don't need to . . . my hunch is over the next four years, whoever is the next president we'll see less troops in Iraq, more in Afghanistan and continuing problems in Pakistan. . .

SCARBOROUGH: You're not wringing your hands now over the state of Iraq. Things are going in a better direction.

HAASS: I'd say in a better direction. But I say that without high confidence about the future. And even a better direction doesn't mean anything remotely looking like a normal country yet . . .

[. . .]

JOHN RIDLEY: . . . we have a poll of Americans in terms of foreign policy, trusting who could be president. John McCain is still narrowly beating Barack Obama. You'd think one of the lessons we learned over the last few CHUCK TODD: Ask Joe. I want to put the question to Joe. Can you name the last time a Republican got elected in the state of Florida for being for lifting the ban on offshore oil drilling?

JOE SCARBOROUGH: When I ran in 1994 in Northwest Florida I was this right-wing nutjob . . . I was conservative's conservative but I took Greenpeace's position on offshore drilling. No offshore drilling in Northwest Florida.

[. . .]

SCARBOROUGH: By the way, Jeb Bush, Connie Mack, all conservatives, all took that position.

TODD: I think that what McCain did, look, it's a pragmatic approach, he can make the pragmatic argument on this, saying, look, I believe that we've gotta work on these issues that are affecting climate change . . . but he's trying to argue, hey, we also need to have some shortcuts here . . . and maybe that means drilling offshore . . . but I tell you, McCain, maybe he thinks he has a big enough lead in Florida that he thinks he can risk this. But if I'm Obama today, I am doing everything I can to make sure that every single costal resident in the state of Florida knows that John McCain has somehow reversed himself on this issue. It is a potentially very vulnerable issue for McCain in Florida. That said, in the rust belt . . . those folks may say, "Hey, we gotta get oil from somewhere." It may be that McCain is kind of saying, ok I'm going to roll the dice here on Florida because I think I can make Obama look like too idealistic. . .

RICHARD COHEN: Yes. I am concerned, not only he, but John McCain also, have set a standard in which they're looking for such pure people that they almost have no past. You can't have been a lobbyist . . . you can't have done this, you can't have done that. You need people with experience. I mean this government is very hard to administer, these enormous problems facing the country, you need people who have been around the block a little bit. Anybody who's been around the block is going to pick up something along the way that may not look good on television for a minute or two, but you gotta stick with them . . .

SCARBOROUGH: And by disqualifying lobbyists! Let's face it, I don't know what people expect politicians and people that work in the administration to do . . . a lot of people that's how they work in between administrations. So if you disqualify lobbyists, you disqualify the smartest people in Washington

COHEN: And the most knowledgeable people in Washington . . . a good lobbyist gets around, a good lobbyist is a first class gossip . . . when John McCain talks about lobbyists with disdain, I understand what he's talking about but at the same time some of his closest friends are lobbyists, they may not be on the campaign at the moment—

[ad plays]

JOHN RIDLEY: I don't think it's a good ad. I think it's a powerful ad . . . it starts as more like a Dove ad, for Dove soap, kind of nice, kind of pleasant and then it takes kind of a sharp turn. I have other issues with it, it's kind of flat . . . but if you're really going to be effective I need something that's going to emote me more than momentarily saying, "You can't have my kid a hundred years from now." Again, talk about subtlety and I don't quite want to use this word because I don't want to sound sexist, but shrill and the ad does feel in some ways shrill instead of touching me as a father . . .

[. . .]

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: I'm just wondering what you think about the use of the "one hundred years." Because at this point I think it just feels like a cheap shot. That line has been almost practically revoked by John McCain, or at least clarified.

SCARBOROUGH: Well and even Frank Rich . . . who has been critical of John McCain and George Bush's position on the war, said that that's a cheap shot. That being said, if you say things like that, it's going to come abck and you're going to hear it time and time again in the campaign.

BRZEZINSKI: Actually, I think voters are smart enough to say, "Oh, they're using that line again."

[. . .]

SCARBOROUGH: I think lifting a baby and putting in front of a face to elect somebody, in any political race, is probably going to backfire.

[. . .]

SCARBOROUGH: It has begun. The war of these independent groups. It doesn't really matter what McCain and Obama say about what kind of high minded, independent campaign they're going to run, it's going to get down to the mud pretty fast with these independent groups . . .

CHUCK TODD: It is. I think it was a borderline shameless ad. Using a baby like that. It just seems like a sledgehammer in the message that I guess they were trying to send. Stuff like that, it strikes me as an ad that's going to backfire a lot. Not a little. But the independent groups, you know, we'll see. You know, the Republican side, frankly, is having a hard time getting their independent groups funded. It has really become kind of a serious, competitive issue. MoveOn has never, never been at aloss for money and even though you've got Obama doing everything he kind to sort of discourage some major donors from getting other 527s started, MoveOn . . . has always been able to raise money.

Reuters: "Hillary Clinton says Merkel is Europe's 'greatest leader'"

By Stephen Brown

July 6, 2014, 8:39 a.m. EDT

Former U.S. secretary of state Hillary Clinton called Chancellor Angela Merkel "the greatest leader in Europe" during a visit to Berlin on Sunday and said it was high time America had a woman leader too, though without confirming she would seek the job.

Clinton also referred to Russian President Vladimir Putin as a "tough customer with a pretty thin skin" in an appearance at a Berlin theatre to promote her new book, "Hard Choices".

The former senator and wife of ex-President Bill Clinton is widely expected to run for the White House in 2016 and has cited Merkel as a good argument for the United States having a woman president soon.

"I think we are ready for a woman to break through the glass ceiling," Clinton said in an interview with Bild am Sonntag newspaper, adding that she would decide whether to run for president "at the end of this year or early next year".

Clinton joked at the Schiller Theater about her and Merkel's shared taste for pants suits and voiced admiration for the chancellor's leadership of

"I say in the book I think she is the greatest leader in Europe, I think she is a great leader globally, I think she carried Europe on her shoulders and it wasn't easy," she said.

Associated Press: "Spy Case Threatens to Sour German-US Ties Anew"

By Geir Moulson

July 6, 2014, 9:48 a.m. EDT

German-U.S. relations are facing a new test over a German intelligence employee who reportedly spied for the U.S., with Germany's president saying if the allegations are true, that kind of spying on allies must stop.

Prosecutors say a 31-year-old German was arrested last week on suspicion of spying for foreign intelligence services, and that he allegedly handed over 218 documents between 2012 and 2014. German media, without naming sources, have reported he was an employee of Germany's foreign intelligence service who says he sold his services to the U.S.

Germany's Foreign Ministry summoned the U.S. ambassador Friday to help clarify the case. The country's top security official stepped up the pressure Sunday.

"I expect everyone now to assist quickly in clearing up the accusations - and quick and clear statements, from the USA too," Interior Minister Thomas de Maiziere was quoted as saying in Bild newspaper.

The issue threatens to strain German-U.S. relations again after earlier reports that the National Security Agency spied on Germans, including on Chancellor Angela Merkel's cellphone.

If it turns out the U.S. "gave this kind of assignment to one of our intelligence employees, then it really has to be said: That's enough now," President Joachim Gauck said on ZDF television.

The head of a parliamentary committee investigating the activities of U.S. and allied spies, Patrick Sensburg, said he has no information that documents from the panel were spied on, but government documents destined for the committee may have been.

The U.S. Central Intelligence Agency and the National Security Council have declined to comment.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton said at a book presentation in Berlin it's "a serious issue."

"Let's find out what the facts are and then let's act appropriately, but also try to be careful not to undermine the necessary cooperation which exists between us," she said.

Sen. John McCain isn't eager to embrace the title of "Hillary Clinton's favorite Republican."

"I hope this program is blacked out in Arizona," McCain said on CBS's "Face The Nation." "Please cut this."

The former secretary of state named McCain as her favorite member of the GOPduring an interview last month. Asked by host Bob Schieffer who his favorite Democrat was, McCain didn't return the compliment.

"I think it's my job to work with every president, if she regrettably obtains the presidency," he said, adding: "I respect Hillary Clinton. I may not agree with her."

ITV: "Hillary Clinton on This Morning"

[No Writer Mentioned]

July 4, 2014

Hillary Clinton on running for Presidency: "I have to decide that it is the right thing for me and it is the right thing for my country at this time"

On her marriage to Bill: "I knew he was trouble from the moment I met him"

On meeting Obama post losing out in the US Primaries: "It was like an awkward first date"

During an interview on today's This Morning programme on ITV, Hillary Clinton explained to hosts Eamonn Holmes and Ruth Langsford how she would normally celebrate Independence day. Hillary said, "We would be at home, we'd probably go to a barbecue or a picnic, we'd go see the fireworks, that's what we always do and I do miss it but I'm happy to be here" Before praising the British weather.

On her new book, Hard Choices, Hillary expressed some of the hard choices she has had to face during her personal and professional life. She said "Obviously to get married, to stay married, to take care of my ageing mother, she lived with us for the last years of her life. To worry about my child and now my future grandchild... I don't know any woman who doesn't worry about the hard choices we face and it is always a challenge to try to make sure that you're being responsible in making those choices and I respect people who make responsible choices but that doesn't mean they're less hard it just means they come at different points in your life and you have to be ready for them."

Explaining how she balances personal choices and choices up for scrutiny on the world stage, Hillary explained, "I was in a front row seat helping to make some of the hardest choices during the four years I served as Secretary of State. How do you gather information, how do you know it's right, who can you trust? … You have to make these decisions and you know that you're an imperfect person and you know that you have imperfect information and you know that no matter what you decide there will be consequences, some of them unintended."

When asked if she is able to sleep at night when juggling all these things, Hillary admitted, "Yes I can, because what I try to do during the day, which is always very intense and active for me, is to do the best I can… Leaders are like citizens, we have our strengths and we have our weaknesses and I think in a democracy what is so great about our system of government is we pick among the citizenry, there is no ordained leader… each of us who's given a responsibility has to do the best we can. I fault people who don't try to do the best they can. I believe that someone in whatever position whatever job, if you're doing the best you can… I give you my respect."

Following her confession of enjoying book tours - and Eamonn requesting her to sign his copy - Hillary revealed how enjoyable she found writing the book and the reasons for doing it and what people will learn from it. She said, "I hope that they will see that the curtain has been pulled back on how you make these hard choices or at least how we made them… I have a whole chapter on women's rights and gay rights because for me, that's unfinished business, I think we have to do more to make sure every woman and girl has a chance to fully participate and I think we have to end discrimination and other forms of abuse against gay people. I want people to know what my values were, what the United States was doing, what we stand for and see whether there's any points of identification."

When pushed on the big question of running for President in 2016, Hillary looked into Eamonn eyes and confessed, "I don't know. And the reason I don't know is because I know a lot about the job. I have had the most extraordinary front row seat in the administration of my husband obviously. After 9/11 I had to work very closely with President Bush because I was a Senator from New York, I had to deal with the horror of our being attacked and then serving as a partner and friend to President Obama. It is such an overwhelming job."

Hillary added, "We have a lot of very capable people, I am absolutely confident that we have in my party, the democratic party, a number of people who are governors, senators, others who could compete and be successful. I have to decide that it's the right thing for me and it's the right thing for my country at this time. I am going to become a grandmother, to me, that's really exciting… I want to fully participate in that experience, I don't want to be looking over the shoulder of my new grandchild thinking 'what am I going to be doing next year' I want to be really focused on what's important in the here and now."

On working mother guilt and whether she feels it, Hillary admitted, "I'm very proud of my daughter and very grateful that I'm her mother but I also invested a lot of time and effort into being the best mother I could be, not perfect by any means, but the best that I could be and I want to do the same for my grandchild and I really feel at the end of the day the most important responsibility that any parent has is to do that."

Recalling the campaign against Obama and their first meeting post his win, Hillary confessed, "We knew each other before that campaign, and it was a very hard fought campaign. Everything you saw was exactly what was going on."

She added, "We met - it was like an awkward first date between teenagers, just the two of us one on one - after the end of the primaries and we sat and talked and cleared the air between us. We had a glass of wine. Did I swear? Not in that meeting! But what I told him was exactly how I felt. It had been hard fought. He won, I lost. And I was going to do everything I could to get him elected President. He asked for my help, he asked for Bill's help... and we did more than a hundred events to try to help him and we were thrilled and relieved that he won."

Before continuing, "And there were rumours that he might offer me something but I really didn't not believe them because there are always rumours... but I went to see him, he asked me to be his secretary of state. And I said no! I also said no to my husband the first two times when he asked me to marry him, so this is like a pattern that I have with these charismatic men!"

On not taking Bill's name when she first got married, Hillary explained, "He didn't mind at all, it was everyone else that minded. And that's why I became Hillary Rodham Clinton as that covered every ones concerns. But it is a right, it's a choice... and it's one of the choices a woman should make. But when I made the decision to become Hillary Rodham Clinton, I felt very comfortable with that."

Opening up about standing by her husband during difficult times with indiscretions, Hillary revealed, "It is such an individual choice and I have lived long enough to have had close friends go through similar situations. Some have made the choice to continue the relationship and some not to, for me, it was a very hard choice but the right choice to choose forgiveness and to continue what had become such a central part of our lives. I'm very grateful that that was the decision I made, but I'm also very respectful when others make a different decision."

She added, "I believe I would have made exactly the same decision if we had of been Mr and Mrs Smith, but when you're in public and people are throwing their views at you, you really have to be very conscious of listening to your own heart and not being pushed or pulled prematurely in one direction or another... and that was challenging."

When Eamonn said 'as they say in Ireland, do you still fancy him?' Hillary replied, "Yes. Because I knew he was trouble from the moment I met him! That's why I turned him down twice when he asked me to marry him! He is an extraordinary combination of intelligence and charisma, but also of empathy and kindness and sensitivity...he was raised to really try and put himself in another person's shoes, so he's always very aware of what others are going through and I find him incredibly fanciable!"

On what her husband feels about her decision to stand for Presidency or not, Hillary said, "He says very clearly that he will support whatever I decide and that's the right attitude. He knew from a very young age that he knew he wanted to run for public office and maybe some day run for president... but I never thought that. It was not something that I grew up believing. So he's a great guide as he's been through it and understands the various difficulties of the decision making."

New York Times opinion: Jacob Heilbrunn, National Interest editor: "The Next Act of the Neocons"

By Jacob Heilbrunn

July 5, 2014

After nearly a decade in the political wilderness, the neoconservative movement is back, using the turmoil in Iraq and Ukraine to claim that it is President Obama, not the movement's interventionist foreign policy that dominated early George W. Bush-era Washington, that bears responsibility for the current round of global crises.

Even as they castigate Mr. Obama, the neocons may be preparing a more brazen feat: aligning themselves with Hillary Rodham Clinton and her nascent presidential campaign, in a bid to return to the driver's seat of American foreign policy.

To be sure, the careers and reputations of the older generation of neocons — Paul D. Wolfowitz, L. Paul Bremer III, Douglas J. Feith, Richard N. Perle — are permanently buried in the sands of Iraq. And not all of them are eager to switch parties: In April, William Kristol, the editor of The Weekly Standard, said that as president Mrs. Clinton would "be a dutiful chaperone of further American decline."

But others appear to envisage a different direction — one that might allow them to restore the neocon brand, at a time when their erstwhile home in the Republican Party is turning away from its traditional interventionist foreign policy.

It's not as outlandish as it may sound. Consider the historian Robert Kagan, the author of a recent, roundly praised article in The New Republic that amounted to a neo-neocon manifesto. He has not only avoided the vitriolic tone that has afflicted some of his intellectual brethren but also co-founded an influential bipartisan advisory group during Mrs. Clinton's time at the State Department.

Mr. Kagan has also been careful to avoid landing at standard-issue neocon think tanks like the American Enterprise Institute; instead, he's a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, that citadel of liberalism headed by Strobe Talbott, who was deputy secretary of state under President Bill Clinton and is considered a strong candidate to become secretary of state in a new Democratic administration. (Mr. Talbott called the Kagan article "magisterial," in what amounts to a public baptism into the liberal establishment.)

Perhaps most significantly, Mr. Kagan and others have insisted on maintaining the link between modern neoconservatism and its roots in muscular Cold War liberalism. Among other things, he has frequently praised Harry S. Truman's secretary of state, Dean Acheson, drawing a line from him straight to the neocons' favorite president: "It was not Eisenhower or Kennedy or Nixon but Reagan whose policies most resembled those of Acheson and Truman."

Other neocons have followed Mr. Kagan's careful centrism and respect for Mrs. Clinton. Max Boot, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, noted in The New Republic this year that "it is clear that in administration councils she was a principled voice for a strong stand on controversial issues, whether supporting the Afghan surge or the intervention in Libya."

And the thing is, these neocons have a point. Mrs. Clinton voted for the Iraq war; supported sending arms to Syrian rebels; likened Russia's president, Vladimir V. Putin, to Adolf Hitler; wholeheartedly backs Israel; and stresses the importance of promoting democracy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's easy to imagine Mrs. Clinton's making room for the neocons in her administration. No one could charge her with being weak on national security with the likes of Robert Kagan on board.

Of course, the neocons' latest change in tack is not just about intellectual affinity. Their longtime home, the Republican Party, where presidents and candidates from Reagan to Senator John McCain of Arizona supported large militaries and aggressive foreign policies, may well nominate for president Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky, who has been beating an ever louder drum against American involvement abroad.

In response, Mark Salter, a former chief of staff to Senator McCain and a neocon fellow traveler, said that in the event of a Paul nomination, "Republican voters seriously concerned with national security would have no responsible recourse" but to support Mrs. Clinton for the presidency.

Still, Democratic liberal hawks, let alone the left, would have to swallow hard to accept any neocon conversion. Mrs. Clinton herself is already under fire for her foreign-policy views — the journalist Glenn Greenwald, among others, has condemned her as "like a neocon, practically." And humanitarian interventionists like Samantha Power, the ambassador to the United Nations, who opposed the second Iraq war, recoil at the militaristic unilateralism of the neocons and their inveterate hostility to international institutions like the World Court.

But others in Mrs. Clinton's orbit, like Michael A. McFaul, the former ambassador to Russia and now a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution, a neocon haven at Stanford, are much more in line with thinkers like Mr. Kagan and Mr. Boot, especially when it comes to issues like promoting democracy and opposing Iran.

Far from ending, then, the neocon odyssey is about to continue. In 1972, Robert L. Bartley, the editorial page editor of The Wall Street Journal and a man who championed the early neocon stalwarts, shrewdly diagnosed the movement as representing "something of a swing group between the two major parties." Despite the partisan battles of the early 2000s, it is remarkable how very little has changed.

Washington Post: "What's left of the political center?"

By Dan Balz

July 5, 2014, 7:37 p.m. EDT

In a politically polarized nation, what constitutes the middle ground?

The answer is not as simple as it might seem. We are in a time in which there are both rising expressions of independence from the two major parties by many Americans and elections in which the red-blue divisions are increasingly stark.

Party identification tells one part of it, the story of a country moving away from allegiance to the major political parties. A decade ago, about one-third of Americans described themselves as independents, according to Gallup surveys. Today that's grown to four in 10 or more. In some states that allow registration by party, the biggest increases have been among those who decline to identify with either the Republicans or Democrats.

Voting behavior tells a different story. In recent elections, at least nine of every 10 people who identify themselves as Republicans or Democrats — or who say they are independents but lean toward one party or the other — vote for the candidate of their party down the ballot. In 2012, only about 11 percent of voters said they cast split tickets. The percentage of true independents may be only about 10 percent of the electorate.

The trend toward polarized politics is well documented. From the most recent studies by the Pew Research Center to a sizeable body of continuing work by political scientists, it's clear that partisanship drives a considerable portion of the electorate. The gap between those on the left and right — especially among the most politically engaged citizens — is deeper and more passionately expressed that it was in the past.

About a fifth of the population is now either consistently conservative or consistently liberal, according to Pew's analysis. Add to that those citizens who are generally conservative or generally liberal and that accounts for, roughly, an additional 40 percent of the population. That leaves about four in 10 somewhere in the ideological middle. According to Pew, that middle ground has shrunk over the past decade or so, when it accounted for half the population.

Those in the middle are often assumed to be moderate in their political outlook. If that's the measure, they too constitute a smaller share of the electorate than they once did. Until 2009, according to Gallup's historical tables, moderates were the largest group in the electorate — more than four in 10. Last year, 34 percent of Americans identified themselves as moderate, the lowest found by Gallup in its polls.

Today a plurality of people describe themselves as conservatives — but the group that has risen most rapidly in the past few years are those who call themselves liberals.

Independents are still more likely to call themselves moderates than as liberals or conservatives. What Gallup has seen in recent years is that more and more independents describe their ideology as conservative.

The reason for that, according to Gallup's analysis of the numbers, is that people who once called themselves Republicans now say they're independents. Their party identification has changed but not necessarily their ideology.

Still another factor that complicates the picture is the fact that people who may be classified as part of the political middle aren't necessarily in the middle of the electorate and doesn't mean they really are moderate in their views.

The Pew study in fact found something quite different. People who didn't fall into the polarized extremes sometimes hold views similar to those who are. They're just not consistent about it. "Being in the center of the ideological spectrum means only that a person has a mix of liberal and conservative values, not that they take moderate positions on all issues," according to the Pew analysis.

One consistent finding is that those who now constitute the middle are less active politically than those on the left or right. "The voters in the middle tend to be much less engaged in politics than those near the poles — less interested, less attentive, less knowledgeable and less active," said Alan Abramowitz, a political science professor at Emory University. "So the more active and knowledgeable the set of voters, the more polarized they tend to be."

The Pew study looked at the electorate in another way, grouping people into different categories based on a variety of measures. This typology, the latest in a series dating to 1987, described eight distinct groups among the population. Seven of the groups are politically engaged. The other is on the sidelines — not even registered to vote.

Three of the seven politically engaged groups are the partisan anchors for either the Democrats or the Republicans. "Steadfast Conservatives" and "Business Conservatives" are loyal to the Republican Party and "Solid Liberals" are attached to the Democratic Party. Together they make up 36 percent of the population, 43 percent of registered voters and 57 percent of the people who are politically engaged.

Among those not at the polarized wings of the electorate are three groups that lean toward the Democrats — "Hard-Pressed Skeptics," "Next Generation Left" and "Faith and Family Left" — and one that aligns with the Republicans — "Young Outsiders." These four groups make up 54 percent of the population but only 43 percent of politically engaged people.

Notably they are more difficult to categorize in their political behavior. As the Pew study put it, they are "less partisan, less predictable and have little in common with each other or the groups at either end of the political spectrum. The one thing they do share is that they are less engaged politically than the groups on the right or left."

However disparate, however disengaged and whatever its size, the middle of the electorate cannot be ignored by either party. The shifting sentiments of these voters have caused big swings in elections over the past decade. In 2006, independents swung one way and helped Democrats take control of the House. In 2010, they went the opposite way and gave Republicans control of the House.

Gary Jacobson, a political science professor at the University of California at San Diego, describes the political middle this way in an e-mail message: "It does not form a potentially coherent coalition around which some political entrepreneur might build a centrist party," he wrote. "People in it are more susceptible to short-term political tides (because they are less partisan and ideological) and thus help to swing elections."

CNN: "The 'Inside Politics' Forecast: Hillary Clinton's European road test" [Excerpt]

By John King

July 6, 2014, 8:47 a.m. EDT

CNN's John King and other top political reporters empty out their notebooks each Sunday on "Inside Politics" to reveal five things that will be in the headlines in the days, weeks and months ahead.

Washington (CNN) – This week's final trip around the "Inside Politics" table unearthed some glimmers of Democratic hope this midterm election year, a potential replay of sorts in Kansas and a glimpse at Hillary Clinton's hopes for the Europe leg of her book tour.

1. Hillary Clinton's European road test

Hillary Clinton spent her Fourth of July across the Atlantic, selling "Hard Choices" to a European audience and, as Politico's Maggie Haberman shares, looking to move past some of the rocky moments of her book roll out tour.

Clinton has a few more interviews where her allies expect she's going to continue cleaning up a lot of the fallout from the dead-broke gaffe and some of her other missteps.

Then she's going to disappear for most of the summer - in the Hamptons.

And the hope from her allies, according to Maggie, is that she has learned something from what went wrong in the last couple of weeks and will demonstrate that in the fall.

The Hill: "Mitt Romney's 2014 renaissance"

By Cameron Joseph

July 6, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EDT

Mitt Romney is looking to keep his sterling endorsement streak alive as the 2014 campaign transitions from primary to general election season.

The former GOPpresidential nominee has a perfect record after getting involved in a number of competitive Republican races this year. Now, with Senate control on the line and his party eager to add to their House majority, he's turning his attention to helping many of those same candidates in tough fall battles.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Free from the pressures of daily life in the spotlight, Romney has undergone a latter-day renaissance, rebuilding his public image after a brutal 2012 campaign.

Two years later, he's being welcomed on the trail with open arms as one of his party's most sought-after surrogates. Republican candidates and strategists salivate over his fundraising prowess and seem less and less worried about potential baggage from appearing with him.

"As an elder statesman in the party, he's able to endorse good, conservative candidates that can win. For too long the party has been without someone who can help the most conservative candidates who can win a primary and still win the general," said Ryan Williams, a former Romney aide who is now working former Massachusetts Sen. Scott Brown, now running in New Hampshire.

Romney stumped with Brown on Wednesday in the Granite State, just the latest in a crowded schedule of campaign events. He's already headed to more than a dozen states to help the GOP, from New York and California to Idaho and Michigan.

The former Massachusetts governor has endorsed 33 candidates this election cycle, including many facing competitive primaries. So far, not a single one has lost.

The prodigious fundraiser has held about two dozen campaign and fundraising events for those candidates and the national party, including major fundraisers for the Republican National Committee, National Republican Senatorial Committee, National Republican Congressional Committee and Republican Governors Association.

And he's not done yet. Sources close to Romney say he's in the midst of scheduling another round of campaign trips for his allies heading in mid- to late-August.

With his presidential hopes gone, Republicans say Romney is able to help boost candidates without regard for his own political fortunes. He's repaying allies and helping the party wrestle down candidates the GOP establishment believes could cost them seats and hurt their national brand.

His deep fundraising network, maintained by former Romney finance chairman Spencer Zwick, remains a powerful weapon for the GOP. Candidates and committees have also taken advantage of renting his robust email list, Targeted Victory, for online fundraising.

Strategists say Romney may not be universally beloved, but say the stench of the 2012 campaign has mostly faded. They also point out that he won most of the states and districts the 2014 campaign is being fought in, particularly with red-state Senate seats the GOP hopes to flip.

Even though his primary appeal may be to donors and not voters in the general election, he's still playing a critical role for a party that lacks someone with the star power of a President Obama or Hillary Clinton.

"He's a tier-one fundraiser," said one national GOP strategist whose organization has benefitted from Romney's help in recent months. "His skill is primarily fundraising."

Romney was one of the first big-name Republicans to back Iowa state Sen. Joni Ernst in her come-from-behind primary victory. He helped boost her struggling fundraising and low name recognition to give national Republicans the candidate they wanted in the open seat race. A number of Romney's past Iowa staff are involved in Ernst's campaign.

"Romney got behind Joni before anybody did, back in February, back before anyone else had endorsed us, before the squeal ad or anything," Ernst spokeswoman Gretchen Hamel said. "He got out early behind Joni and did bring some attention to her."

He also played a big role in helping Rep. Mike Simpson (R-Idaho) slay his Club for Growth-backed Tea Party challenger. Romney came into the heavily Mormon district for fundraisers and campaign rallies, and cut an ad for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to boost Simpson's campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We are proud to have worked closely with Gov. Romney in Idaho and the Iowa Senate race," Chamber political director Rob Engstrom told The Hill in an email. "His support for American free enterprise speaks for itself.

Democrats are still trying to reuse some of their old playbook against Romney, attacking the blue- and purple-state candidates who have appeared with Romney. But most privately admit that Romney can raise big money and won't be their main boogeyman this fall.

"There are some states he's been a liability in, but not nearly as much as the Republican candidates themselves are," said Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee spokesman Justin Barasky. "Joni Ernst is a bad fundraiser and Mitt Romney can provide her a boost. But she has a whole host of problems he can't fix."

Romney's flurry of events come as his numbers have improved and President Obama's have sunk. A recent poll from Quinnipiac University found that 45 percent of voters thought the country would be in better shape had Romney beaten Obama, while 38 percent disagreed.

"The fact that candidates are so eager to be endorsed and supported by Gov. Romney show that he's much more popular than he was even a year ago. He's an elder statesman, serious, sober with gravitas in the party and he's really taken up the mantle of elder statesman," said Williams.

All that activity has led to some buzz about Romney running for president one more time. But he's repeatedly ruled out a third presidential bid, and those close to him dismiss the notion.

"I'm crossing my fingers but I don't think that's likely," Williams laughed. "He's pretty emphatic in ruling that out."

Romania stands at the crossroads of Europe's many current challenges. With Russia's aggression in the East and the refugee crisis pouring in from the South, Romania must deal with the various internal and external consequences. As the potential for instability increases, Romania continues to seek policies to alleviate these pressures in line with EU and NATO positions, remaining a strong partner in the region. The German Marshall Fund of the United States (GMF) invites you to a discussion with former Romanian Senate President Mircea Dan Geoană, Head of the Romanian President's Chancellery Sorin Dan Mihalache, and Romanian Ambassador George Maior on the challenges facing Romania. This event will be on-the-record and moderated by GMF Senior Vice President Ivan Vejvoda.

Mircea Dan Geoană is president of the Aspen Institute Romania and a current Romanian senator. He is also a member of the boards of the Aspen Institute U.S., Aspen Italia, and Aspen Germany. He was the former president of the Romanian Senate from December 2008 to November 2011. Prior to that, Dr. Geoană was the chairman of the Romanian Social-Democrat Party (PSD) from 2005 to 2010, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee in the Romanian Senate, and a member of the European Integration Joint Committee of the Romanian Parliament. In January 2006, he was elected chairman of the Socialist International Committee for Southeastern Europe. Dr. Geoană also previously served as the Romanian foreign minister from 2000 to 2004.

Sorin-Dan Mihalache was appointed head of Presidential Chancellery on December 22, 2014 right after the election of Klaus Iohannis as president of Romania. He has broad political experience, having led numerous political, policy, and communications campaigns on behalf of the National Liberal Party between 2009 and 2014 and President Iohannis in 2014. From 2004 to 2008, Mihalache served a complete term as member of the Romanian Chamber of Deputies, while in 2006 and 2007, he held a seat as observer and then as member of the European Parliament (MEP). Prior public positions include secretary general of the Romanian Senate from 2013 to 2014, deputy secretary general of the Romanian government in 2012, and advisor to the Romanian prime minister from 2001 to 2004. He is a graduate of the Bucharest University Law School and the National Defense College, and has a doctoral degree in political science.

George Cristian Maior has served as ambassador of Romania to the United States since September 2015. Prior to this, he served as director of the Romanian Intelligence Service. In November 2004, he was elected senator in the Romanian Parliament, where he held various positions, including chairman of the Committee for Defense, Public Order and National Security; member of Joint Committee for the Parliamentary Oversight on the Foreign Intelligence Service Activity; and member of the Senate Committee for Human Rights, Cults and Minorities. Between 2000 and 2004, he held the position of state secretary and head of the Department for Euro-Atlantic Integration and Defense Policy within the Ministry of National Defense. In 1992, he received his LL.M. in International and Comparative Law at the George Washington University, Washington DC, and in 1997, he was conferred a PhD in International Law at the "Babeș Bolyai" University in Cluj Napoca.

THE BIG IDEA:

— Jeb Bush gave valuable ammunition to Democratic ad makers yesterday when he declared ,"I'm not sure we need half a billion dollars for women's health issues," while referring to the debate over Planned Parenthood. Bush tried to clean up his comment with not one but two statements. The second version added the words "I misspoke."

The kerfuffle highlighted how hard it will be for Republicans to play offense on women's issues in a sustained way. In 2012, pro-life candidates blew two winnable Senate races with comments about rape and abortion, as Mitt Romney lost women by double digits. Republicans were much more cautious in 2014, even running commercials touting their support for widely-available birth control. Using the embarrassing undercover videos of Planned Parenthood officials, another of which came out yesterday, social conservatives have convinced GOP operatives that this will be a winner in 2016. A handful of Republicans running for president are now threatening to shut down the federal government this fall to try cutting off Planned Parenthood, which is already barred from using federal funds to pay for abortion.

Even after the hard-to-defend videos, the group is still viewed favorably by 45 percent of Americans, according to this week's NBC/Wall Street Journal poll . Only 30 percent view it negatively. As a point of comparison, the same poll found that Jeb is viewed positively by 26 percent of Americans and negatively by 40 percent.

Bottom line: The GOP does not have the numbers to ultimately succeed, as demonstrated by a test vote on Monday, and it is inconceivable that there would not be more inartful comments like Jeb's during a prolonged legislative battle. Sensing the opportunity to run the war-on-women playbook, Hillary Clinton quickly pounced on Twitter:

> .@JebBush : You are absolutely, unequivocally wrong. — Hillary Clinton (@HillaryClinton) August 4, 2015

Bush's comment even drew rebukes from the right. "Yeesh," tweeted the political editor at the conservative site Townhall, Guy Benson, arguing that the comment will help

Democrats "obfuscate" on Planned Parenthood's "barbarity" by "conflating" the issues. A senior writer at The Weekly Standard, John McCormack, wondered : "Isn't one benefit of an establishment candidate supposed to be that he's not going to make gaffes like this?" Meanwhile, on the left, the Huffington Post said the "unforced error" evoked the ghost of Romney. On the defensive, trying to get the right to rally around him, Bush responded to Clinton on Twitter last night:

> .@HillaryClinton what's absolutely, unequivocally wrong is giving taxpayer $ to an org whose practices show no regard for lives of unborn — Jeb Bush (@JebBush) August 4, 2015

— The FBI has begun looking into the security of Hillary's private e-mail setup. The Post scoops that agents have in the past week contacted a Denver-based technology firm that helped manage the unusual system. "Also last week, the FBI contacted Clinton's lawyer, David Kendall, with questions about the security of a thumb drive in his possession that contains copies of work e-mails Clinton sent during her time as secretary of state," Carol D. Leonnig, Rosalind S. Helderman and Tom Hamburger report. "The FBI's interest in Clinton's e-mail system comes after the intelligence community's inspector general referred the issue to the Justice Department in July. Intelligence officials expressed concern that some sensitive information was not in the government's possession and could be 'compromised.' The referral did not accuse Clinton of any wrongdoing, and the two officials said Tuesday that the FBI is not targeting her."

New details raise fresh questions about the security of Clinton's system: The server installed in her Chappaqua, N.Y., home as she was preparing to take office as secretary of state was originally used by her 2008 presidential campaign. The staffers who set it up had limited training in computer security: "In 2008, responsibility for the system was held by Justin Cooper, a longtime aide to the former president who served as a personal assistant and helped research at least two of his books. Cooper had no security clearance and no particular expertise in safeguarding computers, according to three people briefed on the server setup." The email system was also unreliable: it crashed for days after Hurricane Sandy in October 2012, while HRC was still at State.

— Terrible New Hampshire numbers show why Hillary launched a $2 million ad buy this week: A WMUR Granite State Poll published last night shows Clinton leads Bernie Sanders by only 6 points, 42-36, with 5 percent backing Joe Biden. The sample is small (276 likely Democratic primary voters), but it follows a national NBC/WSJ survey that shows Clinton's unfavorable numbers rising among crucial constituencies, including white women, young people, independents and African Americans.

— John Kasich and Chris Christie have made the cut for Fox News' debate tomorrow night. Rick Perry did not. Based on an average of the five most recent national polls, the 10 candidates invited to be on stage for the 9 p.m. Eastern debate are Donald Trump (23.4%), Jeb Bush (12.0%), Scott Walker (10.2%), Mike Huckabee (6.6%), Ben Carson (5.8%), Ted Cruz (5.4%), Marco Rubio (5.4%), Rand Paul (4.8%), Chris Christie (3.4%) and John Kasich (3.2%). The five polls included in the average were conducted by Bloomberg, CBS News, Fox News, Monmouth University and Quinnipiac University.

The Fox News Decision desk emails to defend the inclusion of Kasich over Perry: "Given the over 2400 interviews contained within the five polls, from a purely statistical perspective it is at least 90% likely that the tenth place Kasich is ahead of the eleventh place Perry."

Whatever the methodology, it is a really big break for Kasich. It would have been humiliating for the sitting governor of Ohio to not appear among the top 10 at a debate in Cleveland. The slight uptick in support seems to validate his super PAC's decision to run a big ad buy in New Hampshire, and Kasich's decision to announce in the weeks before the debate, hoping that he would get some kind of a bounce.

Besides Perry, who is being relegated to the underdog debate? Rick Santorum, Bobby Jindal, Carly Fiorina, Lindsey Graham, Jim Gilmore and George Pataki. These seven will appear together at 5 p.m. Eastern, where each will almost certainly try to make a splash to get their way into coverage of the main debate.

Jindal's super PAC will broadcast an ad on Fox News during the main debate. "The debate in Cleveland is all about a celebrity, but one candidate is moving up where it counts, in Iowa: Bobby Jindal," a narrator says. Jindal is shown at a town hall meeting saying, "If you elect somebody to D.C. that wants to be popular with the mainstream media, we are done as a country." Watch here .

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

–"How the Obama White House runs foreign policy ," by Karen DeYoung: "…it may be too late to change impressions of an [National Security Council] bureaucracy whose size has come to symbolize an overbearing and paranoid White House that insists on controlling even the smallest policy details, often at the expense of timely and effective decisions. When the president has wanted to move swiftly on some of his most ambitious policy initiatives — the opening to Cuba and the early Iran nuclear negotiations — he has circumvented the usual practice for decision-making and kept a close hold within the White House…, the NSC, designed in Harry Truman's time to coordinate sometimes-conflicting diplomatic and defense views, is still widely seen as the place where policy becomes immobilized by indecision, plodding through months and sometimes years of repetitive White House meetings."

— New SEC rule "could reveal the huge pay gap between CEO and worker pay," by Drew Harwell and Jena McGregor: "Thousands of public U.S. companies are likely to soon be forced to share a number many would rather keep under wraps: how much more their chief executives make than their typical rank-and-file employees. The Securities and Exchange Commission is expected to finalize on Wednesday a long-delayed rule forcing businesses to share their "pay ratio"… Fifty years ago, the typical chief executive made $20 for every dollar a worker made; now, that gap is more than $300 to $1, and it's growing."

— "Chelsea Clinton steps into the spotlight, on her own terms ," by Jessica Contrera: "Today, the woman who could become America's only two-time first daughter has decided: If the spotlight must always shine on her, she might as well use it in her favor…She isn't quite a celebrity. Or a philanthropist. Or a politician, though let's not rule that out. Now serving as vice chair of her family's foundation, she has reinvented herself as a champion of uncontroversial causes, her life an endless string of grand entrances, polite speeches, photo-ops — after which she retreats to her eight-figure Manhattan condominium, expecting the media and the public to preserve the boundaries she has cherished since childhood."

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

— The New York Times, "Friends of Joe Biden worry a Run for President Could Bruise his Legacy," by Carl Hulse and Jason Horowitz: "Those supporters, in the White House and the Senate, and within the political circles he has moved in for decades, fear that the legacy Mr. Biden has built as an effective partner who took on tough jobs for President Obama, not to mention the deep reservoir of public good will and sympathy he has amassed in his poignant handling of personal tragedies, could be sacrificed in the pursuit of an unsuccessful challenge to Hillary Rodham Clinton for the Democratic nomination…While the concern about Mr. Biden appears widespread among his political allies, few seem eager to tell him out of fear of hurting his feelings and seeming to be presumptuous about a decision that is all too personal."

— Los Angeles Times, "4 Uber Drivers Cited at LAX Have Serious Criminal Records," by Laura J. Nelson and Joel Rubin: "The drivers have been convicted of child exploitation, identity theft, manslaughter and driving under the influence, according to court records. Each offense would make them ineligible for a city of Los Angeles taxi permit…The disclosures come as the Los Angeles City Council weighs whether to assert jurisdiction over a new airport permit process that would allow Uber and other app-based ride companies to legally pick up passengers at LAX."

— Portland Press Herald, "Opponents of Gay Marriage Suffer Another Loss in Bid to Conceal Donors to Maine Campaign," by Steve Mistler: "The National Organization for Marriage has lost another round in its attempt to hide the identities of donors to a successful 2009 referendum campaign that reversed Maine's marriage equality law…the Maine Supreme Judicial Court refused the organization's request for a stay that would have enabled it to delay complying with a state ethics board ruling that it must file a report identifying the sources of the $2 million that NOM gave to the referendum drive…The decision Tuesday sets the stage for NOM to proceed with an appeal before the Supreme Judicial Court."

BUZZING AT THE CAPITOL:

— The Hill, "McConnell eyes fall talks to avert shutdown ," by Alexander Bolton: "Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) on Tuesday said he would begin negotiations with Democrats to prevent a government shutdown in September. The majority leader vowed there would not be another shutdown on his watch — but it could be difficult to avoid, given the long list of thorny issues he will have to tackle this fall. Funding for the government is set to run out at the end of September, and Democrats and the White House want to increase defense and non-defense spending."

— Politico, "Iran deal foes spend big, get little so far ," by John Bresnahan and Anna Palmer: "Pro-Israel groups have spent more than $11 million on a TV ad blitz aimed at scuttling President Obama's nuclear deal with Iran, but so far they aren't gaining any ground with House and Senate Democrats. Citizens for a Nuclear Free Iran, created by the powerful American Israel Public Affairs Committee, has shelled out more than $11 million since mid-July running ads pressuring lawmakers to vote against the deal when it comes before Congress next month … The group has been running network TV ads in 23 states, spending more than $1 million in California, Florida, New York and Texas, respectively."

"Yet the CNFI ad blitz doesn't appear to have moved any Democratic votes at this point. … Just on Tuesday, Democratic Sens. Barbara Boxer of California, Tim Kaine of Virginia and Bill Nelson of Florida publicly declared their support for the agreement … New York Reps. Nita Lowey and Steve Israel both came out against Obama's deal on Tuesday … However, none of the 151 House Democrats who signed on to a May 7 letter to Obama urging a negotiated settlement over Iran's nuclear weapons program have come out against the P5+1 agreement at this point. Unless the anti-deal forces begin making inroads into that group — which has so far held steady — Congress will not be able to derail the agreement."

— The Hill, "Senators struggling to reach 11th-hour cyber deal ," by Cory Bennett: "The Senate is on the verge of punting again on a long-stalled cybersecurity bill that supporters say is needed to bolster the nation's failing digital defenses. According to several people with knowledge of the negotiations, senators are struggling to reach a deal to restrict floor debate and swiftly move the Cybersecurity Information Sharing Act (CISA) — intended to boost the sharing of data on hackers between the public and private sectors — before the Senate's month-long August recess. While Democrats had apparently settled on a list of roughly a dozen amendments as of Tuesday afternoon, Republicans were still working Tuesday evening to determine which amendments they wanted to see the light of day."

Jon Stewart takes a big parting shot at Fox News. From the Huffington Post : "Jon Stewart has [a few] more nights left in the 'Daily Show' chair, but on Monday he delivered what may be his parting shot at longtime nemesis, Fox News. The network's talking heads have called him a 'tool' of President Barack Obama, referred to the pair as having a 'bromance' and described the comedian as an administration 'propagandist.' So where's the evidence? Instead, Stewart played clip after clip of Fox News hosts over the years gleefully pointing out his many disputes with the administration."

HOT ON THE RIGHT

Fifth Planned Parenthood video turns to "intact" fetuses. From The Hill : "A Planned Parenthood official discusses the procurement and cost of 'intact' fetuses and altering abortion procedures to meet specific needs in a video released Tuesday … In the fifth of a series of videos from the Center for Medical Progress, a woman identified as Melissa Farrell, director of research for Planned Parenthood Gulf Coast, discusses contributing to the organization's 'diversification of the revenue stream' and the potential to 'get creative' with conditions for procurement needs. The video was reportedly filmed in April at a Planned Parenthood facility in Texas."

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: Palin Rally in Scranton, PA 10/14/08

Hello All,

Unfortunately we weren't able to send a tracker to this event. But good news: we were able to capture the event via online-streaming video. Below are the notes from that effort.

Big Highlights

- Says there are world's standards of perfection and then there are god's and those are the final measure (in talking about what she's learned from Trig)
    - Goes into long discussion of her personal experience of having baby with special needs - Says when she and Todd first learned about having kid w/ special needs, they were scared and prayed (now they feel blessed)
- Tweaks attack on Obama for troop funding; says once our young men and women are over there in war zone, you dont vote to cut off funding for troops as obama did. not for political reasons. obama caved to political pressure. that makes me question his judgment and ambition.
- Adds "retraining workers" to list of exceptions from McCain's proposed spending freeze
- Touts McCain's newly unveiled economic plan; picks up talking points he started using yesterday (
- Says whether biden approves it or not, well develop these and look to goodness of clean coal. - our plan for clean coal will create 30k new jobs, e.g. in OH and PA
- Repeats yesterday's lines acknowledging anger about lobbyists, Wall Street, Washington elite, and anger about voter fraud (concludes, let john mccain turn that anger into action)
- Absent are mentions of Obama's connection to Ayers or his abortion record

Scranton, PA: Palin Rally 10/14/08

(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background details

- Palin, accompanied by Todd, walks out into packed sports complex, Crowd chants Sarah! Sarah!
- Signs: "Read my lipstick," "Pennsylvania clings to Sarah" "Another Democrat for McCain"

Speech Highlights

- very good to be back in PA. all you soccer moms and basketball moms and hockey moms, TY for being here to support us. i appreciate you coming out here. this si a beautiful showing of support. i know suome of you have been waiting for some time so we're gonna do something special. you don't just wanna hear me talk. a lil special: welcome Lee Greenwald on stage. [comes up in track suit]
    - Lee Greenwald: That's the wrong music.
    - Palin: hey if everything's going alright that means youre going to slow.
    - [Lee Greenwald leads crowd in National Anthem]
    - LG: as an entertainer, i always felt like i had a role to play in uniting america. just like GP. -- 25 yrs ago i wrote this song to unite america and it still does -- here is my anthem, "God Bless the USA"
- SP: That was beautiful. Before we start a couple of other fellows i'd like you to meet:
    - AK's First Dude Todd Palin - he knows how to work with his hands, Steelworkers Union, 4x snow mobile champ - he knows something about tight races and how to make it to finish line
    - how many of you follow the Iditirod? 4x Idititorod champ, Martin Boozer - another fellow from AK
    - we're learning a lil something about races from these guys who have been the underdog but come out on top
    - and a minute to recognize those who have served our country in uniform [points to individuals, gives them thumbs-ups and thankyous]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- [someone yelling]
- we are 3 wks from election day - itll come down to wire in PA
- we're taking our cause of reform to every voter of every party and every backgrd - we're asking for your vote - are you ready to carry this state to victory? [USA! USA!] are you ready to make john mccain the next POTUS? and are you ready to shake things up in DC? [cheers]
- there is so much at stake. our econ is in crisis, financial mkts collapsing, retirement at risk, jobs vanishing. our country is facing tough times, we need tough leader. we need bold plan of action - not just words - to take this country in new direction.
- we know across america there's a lot of anger about insider dealing of lobbyists, and greed on Wall Street and about arrogance of washington elite, and anger about voter fraud [cheers]. america, let mccain turn that anger into action.
- so just this morning, john mccain set forth a plan to help those who have been hardest hit in this economic crisis. our pension and family security plan. this is going to get our country through a time of testing and it's going to get the economy back on the right track. under this plan, we'll help american families keep their homes and save failing neighborhoods and bring stability to our housing market.
- see predatory lenders that has so taken advantage of a lot of good americans, now those americans are struggling under the weight of the wrong mortgage. so we're going to work with them to get them a fixed rate mortgage that will help them keep their homes. not a handout, but a handup to help them keep their homes. a lot of retirees, a lot of our esteemed elders in this country and folks nearing retirement, they're worried about their loss of savings in this crisis and only john mccain has a plan to change the tax code immediately so that americans can keep money in their retirement accounts and rebuild their savings.
- instead of just giving more billions of tax dollars to the wall street bankers and brokers who got us sloo this mess, john has a plan to help america's workers and small business owners because they're the ones that make the economy run. john and i will bring tax relief to every american and every business so that business owners, you business owners out there, so that you can hire more people. that's how jobs are created. allowing you to keep more of what you earn. and then reinvest. that is how jobs are created
- we'll eliminate unfair tax on unemployment benefits b/c those making a concerted effort to find work shouldnt have to worry about another tax
- mccain has the backbone to confront $10T deficit and we will balance budget by the end of our term. a $10T debt that we're expected to pass onto kids and grandkids. thats not fair. when you're in a hole, you have to quit digging.
- how do we do that? 1st, impose spending freeze to cover all but most vital functions of govt like worker retraining and taking care of vets
- in this great community and those like it, all ppl asking is for govt to be on side to have job in hometown, a plant gate to walk thru and ...
- americans cant afford more tax increases, esp not at time like this. obama had 94 chances to be on your side but was on other side, even on hardworking individuals making just $42k / yr. taxes already too high, but he wants to raise them. govt spending too much, and he wants nearly $1T more. he wants to deepen our debt. americans just cant afford another big spender in WH.
- as sen, mccain who was known as maverick and patriot -- took on special interests and his own party sometimes and other party -- took on wasteful spending and corruption and abuses in Washington. As pres, he'll end those abuses whatever it takes. you can get to know someone via track record. mccain has record of fighting the system when it's not right. i too have track record. not just talking the talk. i had the opportunity to walk the walk and to show you what my intentions are also then in supporting john mccain.
- as mayor, i eliminated personal property taxes, small bus. inventory taxes, annoying things like business license renewal fees. as gov, suspended state fuel tax and vetoing nearly $0.5 in wasteful spending - certainly when you do that, you ruffle some feathers. but you do what you have to do for ppl who hired you. i took chunk of suprlus and gave it back to ppl. we got back to basics in AK and put govt back on side of ppl b/c i always knew i was accountable to the ppl who hired me, the ppl of AK. in a mccain-palin administration, we'll never forget that we're there for you, the ppl of america. [sarah! sarah!]
- mccain also - we have mission to set country firmly on a path to energy indep. develop new energy sources and find better ways to tap into sources we've already got, drilling, mining, nuclear. i get to talk about coal w/ you all b/c you get it. tapping into domestic resources instead of relying on foreign countries to produce it for us. ridiculous. when prices were as high as they were over summer, we were circulating $700b, some of money ends up in hands of ppl who dont like america
- biden said there's no such thing as clean coal [angry yelling] he said even if there were clean coal, in an obama-biden administration, itd be fine if china used it, but it wouldnt be used here at home. [boos] he's also called enviro-friendly offshore drilling "raping" the coast - they both oppose offshore drilling. americans will have clear choice on nov 4. we will adopt all of the above approach, .eg. the wind, the solar, the biomass, the geothermal god has so richly blessed us with. we'll create 45 new nucl plants and create 700k jobs. whether biden approves it or not, well develop these and look to goodness of clean coal. [sarah! sarah!] thank you.

- did you know there's more coal in this free country than there is oil in all of saudi arabia?
- our plan for clean coal will create 30k new jobs in places theyre needed most, e.g. OH and right here in PA. and we'll safely drill for billions of barrels of oil we have waiting for us. and that means going offshore. drill here and drill now. [drill baby drill!] drill baby drill and mine baby mine, yes. for nations security and econ prosperity, we need American energy brought to you by Americans [sarah! sarah!]
- ok john and i have talked about another mission that he'd like me to focus on and i feel blessed to do so: help our fams who have kids w/ special needs. [cheers] it was the great PA gov. Robert Casey, a son of Scranton who was once asked how society should treat most vulnerable among us, such as kids w. special needs. he said it simple: you put them first in line. he understood it that these children inspire a special love and thats something we need more of. they're not a problem, they're a priority and we need to show them the good heart of america. id hope that no matter our party our backgrd, theres a voice of humanity in Casey's wds that speaks to all of us. a lot to say about how those most vulnerable among us who cant speak for themselves. when i learned Trig would have special needs, i had to prepare my heart. at first i was scared and todd and i prayed for strength and understanding. some things ive learned from Trig: everyone belongs in circle of protection; every child has something to contribute if we give them chance; there are world's standards of perfection and then there are god's and those are the final measure; every child deserves love. we love him all the more b/c he is so vulnerable. we stand to learn more from him than he'll learn from us. we're not scared anymore, we feel blessed.
- as gov, ive secured funding for kids w/ special needs, but i want to do more and make sure that these kids and their fams have friend and advocate in WH. [sarah! sarah!]
- for campaign that says all about the future - back to our opponents - they talk a lot about past and pointing fingers backward. the past is easy to find blame. we're looking to the future, where you find solutions. they're looking to past b/c they're trying to run against current admin. but that strategy is wearing pretty doggone thin. mccain is his own man, a patriot, a maverick. from enemy prison camp to halls of congress, he's always put his coutnry frist. he's the only man in this race who talks about the wars america is fighting and he isn't afriad to use word victory. our opponent gives speech after speech - it'd be nice if just 1x he'd say he wants america to win. [usa! usa!] yeah. once our young men and women are over there in war zone, you dont vote to cut off funding for troops as obama did. not for political reasons. biden called him out for it, and he said he wouldn't do it but he caved to political pressure. that makes me question his judgment and ambition.
- mccain served country for 22 yrs, 5 1/2 yrs as POW, met adversity, knows how great challenges overcome. as mom of 1 of those troops, hes exactly kind of man i want as commander in chief.
- PA, nov 4 is coming soon. its gonna come down to what we believe in. what mccain and i believe in is what reagan believed in: fwd mvmt of frdm not the constant expansion of govt, the best of america not all gathered in DC, but is here in the kindness and courage of everyday ppl who grow our food, run our factories, fight our wars, protect our frdm. the promises in this country and all that we wish for our sons and daughters, we believe america is not the problem, but the solution. and we still believe america is that shining city on a hill and htank god we have a man ready and willing to lead it, a man who inspires with heroic and trustworthy deeds, not words.
- our opponents go on about how they fight for you, but since my RM wont say this on his own too often, ill say it for him: theres only 1 man in this race who's ever really fought for you and that man is john mcacin. thank you!! god bless you and god bless america! [sarah! sarah! sarah! sarah!]

Press Release: December 3, 2014

UABA Urges Swift Congressional Passage of S. 2828 and HR. 5782

The Ukrainian American Bar Association (UABA) strongly urges swift Congressional passage of Senate Bill 2828 and House Bill HR 5782. These bipartisan bills will grant Ukraine "Major Non-NATO Ally Status" (MNNA) and defensive military assistance. Once these bills become law, they will greatly enhance the United States' national security interests and will promote peace on the Eurasian continent and throughout the world.

It is obvious that economic sanctions in and of themselves are woefully deficient and will not stop Russia's unlawful aggression against Ukraine. Despite all its denials, the Kremlin now openly deploys its heavily armed military on Ukrainian territory, and continually re-supplies its mercenary "separatists" with impunity under the guise of "humanitarian aid." Putin has doubled down on his bellicose pronouncements and has vehemently restated his resolve to return Russia to the previous borders of the former USSR, and even to expand the Kremlin's hegemony over the eastern parts of the European Union. Obviously, Vladimir Putin has made the economic calculation that he can withstand the financial price of a scolding by the West (including any additional sanctions that could be imposed in the future) -- and all international agreements, promises, and pledges Russia had signed in the past don't matter.

America readily supplies lethal weapons worth billions of dollars to questionable allies in the Middle East. We are ready to put "boots on the ground" to protect countries in that region, many of which have well-equipped armies of their own and the economic strength to fully support their own military, but these same countries do not put their citizenry's boots on the ground to defend their own territorial integrity from invasion. We are asked to do it for them -- and we have done that! However, when it comes to Ukraine, which does not ask America to put our soldiers in the line of fire -- Ukrainians already have their sons and daughters dying daily on the front lines -- but asks only for adequate weapons so that Ukraine's sons and daughters can suitably defend themselves, America rebuffs Ukraine's dire requests with lame excuses.

Had Ukraine received American and Western military aid earlier in a timely fashion, Ukraine would have been in a better military posture to repel the pro-Russian terrorists and seal its border from further Russian incursion. Continued tardiness or inaction by the United States Congress in rendering timely military aid to Ukraine will condemn Ukraine to an endless and hopeless waiting for American assistance -- as the characters in "Waiting for Godot"-- only to have its sovereign territory painfully eroded by Russian aggression, with extensive casualties to its population, with millions of people displaced, and many a young Ukrainian soldier killed by a stronger and brutal aggressor nation whose only goal is imperial territorial expansion. If Ukraine falls, then the horrific conflagration of war will spill over into the eastern part of the European Union and will necessitate American "boots on the ground". All this may be avoided if the United States Congress acts now and fulfills its obligation and duty to give timely military assistance to Ukraine.

Race, gender come to forefront of presidential race
Many black women debate voting for Clinton vs. Obama

By SONJI JACOBS
The Atlanta Journal-Constitution
Published on: 11/29/07
The dozen or so Spelman College women had come together in a basement classroom, after hours, to hash over a choice unimaginable just a few generations back.

Fliers posted across campus summed up the thrust of their conversation: "Should you vote for Barack Obama because of your race, or should you vote for Hillary Clinton because you are a woman?"

With Democratic primaries quickly approaching, black women throughout Atlanta and across the nation are asking each other that question. They are debating it as they post blogs, meet for political round tables, host fund-raisers and whip out their checkbooks.

It's an ongoing discussion that, for many black women, stirs visceral emotions as they weigh their racial and gender identity.

At Spelman that evening, Shayna Atkins, 19, cut to the chase, pointedly asking her peers: "Would you feel like a sellout if you didn't vote for Barack?"

"Maybe if it were 1963," shot back Marquise Alston, another 19-year-old who is a Clinton supporter.
The conversation rarely turned to former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, the other top Democratic presidential contender, or to any Republican front-runners.

For some black women, U.S. Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) embodies a strong leader who, if elected, could open doors for all women, black and white. They admire her intellect and political acumen. In some ways, they identify with Clinton because they see gender as more of a hindrance than race.

For others, U.S. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) represents the ideal candidate. They like his intelligence and willingness to work across racial and party lines. They also identify with his wife, Michelle, an African-American woman from Chicago's South Side. They believe the presence of the Obamas in the White House would help shatter racial and gender stereotypes.

Desiree Pedescleaux, associate professor of political science at Spelman, said the majority of black women in Atlanta will vote for Obama because of their strong identification with race.

She says some black women may support Clinton because of deep admiration or because they view her as the Democratic candidate most likely to succeed. But on an emotional level, Pedescleaux argues, race will trump gender.

"When an African-American woman walks into a room, what do most people see first?" she asked. "They see race. They see her as black before she is a woman."

National polls, however, indicate that black women are leaning toward Clinton. While black men are more evenly split between the two candidates, black women appear to support Clinton in far greater numbers.

In an October CNN Poll of registered Democrats, 68 percent of black women said they would vote for Clinton, who has enjoyed strong support from women overall.

Some political pundits speculate that blacks may feel that an African-American candidate, no matter how qualified, will not win the general election.

Others say former President Clinton's popularity among blacks may be giving his wife a boost.
In Georgia, prominent African-American women such as Valerie Jackson, the widow of Atlanta mayor Maynard Jackson, and Billye Aaron, the wife of baseball legend Hank Aaron, have contributed several thousand dollars to Sen. Clinton's campaign.

Vivian Creighton Bishop, wife of U.S. Rep. Sanford Bishop (D-Ga.), said she has admired Clinton for years.
"Senator Clinton is a brilliant woman," Bishop said. "She's very stately. She's independent and strong."
While her husband is supporting Obama, Bishop wants more African-American women to come out for Clinton.
She is trying to recruit supporters across the state, especially in Atlanta and Columbus, where she lives.
African-Americans make up 27 percent, or 1.2 million, of Georgia's registered voters. And of black registered voters, 60 percent, or 720,567, are women.

Still, with less than two months left before the state's Feb. 5 Democratic and Republican primaries, Obama is leading his Democratic rivals in Georgia fund-raising.

So far, his campaign has raised $1.1 million, more than any other candidate, Republican or Democrat.
Clinton, by contrast, has raised $589,000.
Much of Obama's support has come from Atlanta's black middle class.
Henrietta Antoinin, an Atlanta native and vice president at the Atlanta Life Financial Group, said she has been puzzled by polls and news reports that indicate black women may be torn between Obama and Clinton. She said she and all of her friends are Obama supporters. Antoinin has written a few checks — $50 here, $250 there — to his campaign.

"I think he's smart. I think he's capable. I like what I'm hearing from him," Antoinin said.
She said she respects Clinton and went to her campaign appearance at Paschal's restaurant last month, during which the senator received an endorsement from Rep. John Lewis, a civil rights icon. But Antoinin left still believing Obama is the better candidate.

Patricia Wilson-Smith, a 42-year-old information technology specialist who lives in Lawrenceville, contends that Obama would be the best leader because he reaches out to all Americans. She argues that Clinton is too divisive and too much of a Washington insider.

Six months ago, Wilson-Smith built a Web site, blackwomenforobama.org, started a political blog and founded an organization to support the Obama campaign.

Earlier this month, the group held its first fund-raiser at the Atrium at Sweet Auburn.
On her blog, Wilson-Smith confronts many of the mixed emotions black women have about the candidates.
She dismisses the idea that Obama can't be elected because he is black.
"The reason we've never been close to running that truly feasible black candidate is because we've never had one who was interested in governing the entire nation," she wrote, "and not just championing the cause of blacks."

Wilson-Smith also is critical of those who would vote for Hillary Clinton because of an affinity for Bill Clinton.
In the 1996 presidential election, national exit polls showed Bill Clinton received 84 percent of the votes cast by African-Americans.

Some say his wife's experience as a Washington insider who has tackled major policy issues may be one of her biggest strengths.

Alston, the president of the Spelman chapter of the Young Democrats of America, explained that she supports Clinton because of her strong stance on health care reform and women's rights. She said she believes a woman in the White House will break the proverbial glass ceiling for women in business.

"My mother is a business owner, and one of her biggest struggles is because she's a woman in a male-dominated field," Alston said.

Mary Long, a member of the Democratic National Committee who lives in Atlanta, has trailblazed as both a woman and an African-American, and her accomplishments include heading Georgia's WIN List, an organization that supports Democratic women candidates.

Long said she likes the top three Democratic candidates — Clinton, Obama and Edwards — but has not yet decided whom she will support.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"You think, do I have more trouble with discrimination as an African-American or as a woman?" Long said. "Do you not support Obama, such a strong African-American candidate running for president? Or, are you going to abandon a good woman?"

Long paused. "I'm not sure sometimes, as African-American women, we know where we are. We are constantly straddling that fence. And no matter what you decide, you're going to be criticized."

Black Ministers Back Clinton In S.C.

Clergy Play Key Role In Influencing State's Large African-American Population

(CBS/AP) Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton picked up endorsements from dozens of black ministers Tuesday in South Carolina, an early voting state where she and rival Barack Obama have been courting the critical black vote.

The clergy were drawn to the New York senator for her views on health care, jobs and other issues, said a state representative who helped organize the endorsements. "They felt this was the best candidate addressing their concerns," said state Rep. Harold Mitchell, a Democrat from this northern part of the state.

Nearly half of South Carolina's Democratic primary voters are black, and ministers can play a huge role in shaping the political direction of their congregations. More than 60 ministers gathered with Clinton on a stage at a hotel and her campaign said 88 were in the room where the endorsements were announced.

Clinton, in a wide-ranging speech to a crowd of more than 450, touched on her plans to expand health care, better public education and improve the image of the U.S. She said she would send emissaries around the globe - and mentioned former Secretary of State Colin Powell as "someone I know very well" - to send a message the era of "cowboy diplomacy is over."

"I understand we've got to take on health insurance companies and the drug companies," she said. "Don't you think it is time for us to do that?"

The Rev. Timothy Brown, of Cleveland Chapel in Spartanburg, said Clinton will get government to a "better plateau." He also referenced Obama, a first-term senator who wrote a book called "The Audacity of Hope."

"We need to look for a leader that is ready to lead right now," Brown said. "We don't need to be filling our heads with hopes and dreams."

Also Tuesday, Clinton's campaign released her proposal to combat the spread of HIV and AIDS, which in part focuses on fighting the spread of the illness in minority communities. Clinton would double the HIV/AIDS research budget at the National Institutes of Health to $5.2 billion annually and spend at least $50 billion within five years around the globe, according to an e-mail from her campaign.

Clinton did not focus on the proposal in her first two of three appearances in South Carolina. In Aiken, she was asked by one man about whether gays should be able to openly serve in the military. "I don't believe 'Don't ask, don't tell' worked," she said.

The endorsements from the South Carolina ministers came as Clinton tries to widen what one recent poll showed was as much as a 10 percentage point lead in the state over Obama, an Illinois senator.

"This is just the beginning," said state Sen. Darrell Jackson, a Columbia minister working for Clinton. Similar announcements are in the works in other regions of the state, he said.

Another state senator, Harold Mitchell, told CBS News chief White House correspondent Jim Axelrod that his heart had him backing Obama early on, but he switched to Clinton last month.

"We've got to get away from these emotional feelings," Mitchell said. "If you put that aside and look at the candidates... it's a no-brainer."

Obama has pulpit endorsements of his own. He's visited churches in the state and his campaign has organized forums on faith at churches and community centers. It also sponsored a recent gospel music tour.

In October, Obama stood in front of the pulpit of a Greenville church and told a mostly full, 4,200 seat sanctuary that faith was everything to him. "It's what keeps me grounded. It's what keeps my eyes set on the greatest of heights," he said.

Clinton's husband remains popular with blacks in South Carolina, and the former president apparently helped get the support that was announced Tuesday during a visit to the state last month.

Don Fowler, a former Democratic National Committee chairman, said courting the pulpit is key for the black vote here.

"The church and individual members play an extremely important role in black politics," Fowlers said in an interview last month.

"There's very stiff, intense competition for the hearts and minds of the African-American clergy," he said. "Collectively, they have huge influence."

Obama's campaign said it has held forums educating people about his faith across the state and recruited 180 volunteers who are organizers in their "faith communities."

"Senator Obama is proud of the tremendous support he has from South Carolina congregations and ministers. The successful Obama Faith Forums have allowed us to capture enthusiasm among voters who are interested in how Obama's faith impacts his vision to transform our nation and have a positive impact on issues like healthcare, poverty and education," the campaign said in a statement.

Can Oprah Propel Obama to Victory?

By Eric L. Hinton

Headlines this week: Will Oprah Make the Difference? Mitt Romney Says No Muslims in Cabinet; 'Black Enough' Still Dogging Obama? Clinton Gets Endorsement From Streisand; GOP Set for YouTube Debate

Will Oprah Make the Difference?

Talk about having an ace in your pocket. Democratic presidential candidate Sen. Barack Obama announced Oprah Winfrey would be touring with him in early contest states including Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina, reports CBS News . But just how much Winfrey's public support will help Obama is being debated. A CBS News poll indicates 31 percent of registered voters are more likely to vote for Obama because of Winfrey's support. But Time Magazine writer Mark Halperin says Winfrey only provides what Obama already has in abundance, "campaign cash, celebrity, excitement and big crowds."

'Black Enough' Still Dogging Obama?
The issue of whether he is black enough continues to dog the Obama campaign, reports CBS. For his part, Obama says, "I self-identify as African American. That's how I'm treated and that's how I'm viewed. I'm proud of it."

Romney Says No Muslims in Cabinet

Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney is disputing a report that appeared in the Christian Science Monitor that said he's categorically ruled out having a Muslim as part of his candidate should he be elected president, reports CNN.com (scroll down). Romney admits making the comment but has clarified his statement, saying, "No, I don't think you need to have a Muslim in the Cabinet to take on radical jihad any more than during the second World War we needed to have a Japanese American to help us understand the threat that was coming from Japan."

Romney Cries Foul on Calls Attacking Mormon Faith

Romney is calling a recent string of calls to residents in Iowa and New Hampshire "ugly and divisive." Romney said callers portrayed themselves as members of a nonpartisan polling center and then proceeded to give negative and misleading information about his Mormon faith, according to CNN.com .

Clinton Leads Pack Among Likely Black Voters
Democratic presidential nominee Sen. Hillary Clinton continues to be viewed more favorably by likely black voters, with Obama running second, according to a national survey released by the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies.

Clinton Gets Endorsement From Streisand
A day after Obama announced Oprah Winfrey would be joining him on the campaign trail, the Clinton campaign announced Oscar winner and musical legend Barbra Streisand was going to campaign for Clinton, according to The Associated Press .

Read the Nov./Dec. 2007 issue of DiversityInc magazine now online to find out who's really winning the black women's vote and why.

Other News
Rudy Giuliani, Mitt Romney, Fred Thompson, John McCain and the other Republican presidential contenders are getting set for tonight's CNN/YouTube debate. The Daily News reports Romney and Giuliani may be among the most contentious candidates, as they've spent the last several weeks exchanging barbs over immigration and LGBT rights.

Latino Leaders Want Candidates to Address Small-Business Needs
The United States Hispanic Chamber of Commerce (USHCC) called on all presidential candidates to address the needs of small-business owners. USHCC is particularly interested in each candidate's agenda for the growth of minority- and women-owned enterprises.

Black Issues Get Some Play as GOP Presidential Hopefuls Spar Over Immigration, Taxes

By: Associated Press and BlackAmericaWeb.com
Republican presidential rivals Rudy Giuliani and Mitt Romney scornfully debated immigration Wednesday in a provocative CNN/YouTube debate in St. Petersburg, Florida, held just over a month before the first votes are cast.

Giuliani, the front-runner in national polls, accused Romney of employing illegal immigrants at his home and running a "sanctuary mansion." The testy personal exchange came after Romney said Giuliani had retained New York's status as a sanctuary city while he was mayor.

Romney said it would "not be American" to check the papers of workers employed by a contractor simply because they have a "funny accent." He had landscapers at his Belmont, Mass., home who turned out to be in the country illegally.

Giuliani shot back, calling Romney's attitude "holier than thou."
"Mitt usually criticizes people when he usually has the far worse record," Giuliani said.
The audience, however, booed Giuliani as he tried to persist in his criticism of Romney.
The confrontation came at the start of an innovative CNN-YouTube debate that forced the candidates to confront immigration immediately, signaling the volatility of the issue among Republican voters. The eight Republican candidates encountered a range of questions, including abortion, gun control from a gun wielding NRA member, and farm subsidies from a man eating an ear of corn.

Surprisingly, black issues got some attention from the presidential hopefuls as well, thanks to the videotaped queries from YouTube users. Giuliani and Huckabee took a question on the Republican Party's lack of support from the African-American community submitted by a Los Angeles resident who maintained that blacks "hold fairly conservative views." The subject of the propriety of publicly displaying the Confederate flag was addressed. And a father from Atlanta submitted a question, captured on video with his son, asking about the candidates' positions on inner city violence. "Two hundred to 400 black men die yearly in one city alone," he said. "What are you going to do about that war?"

First to respond, Romney lauded the questioner, saying his son "is pretty fortunate because he's got a dad standing next to him that apparently loves him by all appearances there, and that's probably the best thing you can do for a kid is to have a mom and a dad ... That's number one. And thank heavens Bill Cosby said it like it was. That's where the root of crime starts."

David McMillan from Los Angeles, in his question, noted that "on a variety of specific issues -- gay marriage, taxes, the death penalty, immigration, faith-based initiatives, school vouchers, school prayer -- many African-Americans hold fairly conservative views ... why don't we vote for you?"

"We probably haven't done a good enough job as a party in pointing out that our solutions, our philosophy, is really the philosophy that would be the most attractive to the overwhelming majority of people in the African-American and Hispanic community," replied Giuliani. "here are many, many issues on which we can reach out. I found that one of the best was moving people off welfare. I moved 640,000 people off welfare, most of them to jobs. I change the welfare agency into a job agency, and all of a sudden, I had people that had a future."

Former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee cited CNN's own poll results to bolster his claim that "some 48 percent of the African-Americans in my state did, in fact, vote for me," he said, noting that the figure "is unusually high for African-Americans voting for a Republican. Here's the reason why: Because I asked for their vote, and I didn't wait until October of the election year to do it ... I don't want to be a part of a Republican party that is a tiny, minute and ever decreasing party, but one that touches every American from top to bottom, regardless of race."

The racial politics of the Confederate flag came up via an inquiry from Houston resident Leroy Brooks, who asked candidates if "this flag right here represents the symbol of racism, a symbol of political ideology, a symbol of Southern heritage -- or, is it something completely different?"

Huckabee said that, "with the kinds of issues we got in this country, I'm not going to get involved with a flag like that ... The people of our country have decided not to fly that flag. I think that's the right thing."

He also used his answer to take a shot at Democratic candidate and former senator John Edwards.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Every time I listen to someone like John Edwards get on TV and say there are two Americas, I just want to -- I just want to throw something at the TV, because there are not two Americas. There's one America," Huckabee said. "We are a nation united. We face extraordinary challenges right now. And Democrats dividing us and tearing down this country are doing exactly the wrong thing. We're succeeding in Iraq. We've got tough challenges. We can overcome them. But we do not need to have that kind of divisive talk. And that flag, frankly, is divisive, and it shouldn't be shown."

Former Tennessee Sen. Fred Thompson, noting that "everybody who hangs the flag up in their room like that is not racist," conceded that "I also know that for a great many Americans, it's a symbol of racism. As far as a public place is concerned, I am glad that people have made the decision not to display it as a prominent flag, symbolic of something, at a state capitol. As a part of a group of flags or something of that nature, you know, honoring various service people at different times in different parts of the country, I think that's different. But, as a nation, we don't need to go out of our way to be bringing up things that to certain people in our country that's bad for them."

At the outset of the debate, immigration dominated the questions submitted online and swept in the remainder of the Republican field.

Thompson took the opportunity to distinguish himself from both Romney and Giuliani, arguing that Romney had supported President Bush's plan to provide a path to citizenship for some immigrants in the United States illegally now. He took Giuliani to task for attacking Romney's employment of illegal immigrants.

"I think we've all had people who we've hired who in retrospect was a bad decision," he said.
Sen. John McCain, for whom the immigration issue has proved particularly vexing, defended his support for an unsuccessful overhaul of immigration laws that included a temporary worker program and a path to citizenship.

"We must recognize these are God's children as well," McCain said. "They need our love and compassion, and I want to ensure that I will enforce the borders first. But we won't demagogue it."

Huckabee, who has also come under GOP criticism for some of his immigration policies while governor of Arkansas, defended benefits he supported for children of illegal immigrants, including allowing children to be eligible to apply for college scholarships.

"Are we going to say kids who are here illegally are going to get a special deal?" Romney asked.
Huckabee objected, saying the benefit was based on merit. "We are a better country than to punish children for what their parents did," he said.

The most fierce exchanges were among the candidates with the most at stake with only five weeks left before the first voting in the presidential contest begins. Giuliani leads in national polls but trails Romney in early-voting Iowa and New Hampshire. Romney faces challenges from Huckabee in Iowa and from Giuliani and McCain in New Hampshire.

Thompson, in what amounted to one of the first video attacks of the campaign, questioned the conservative credentials of two of his rivals in a YouTube clip. The video challenged Romney on abortion and Huckabee on taxes.

"I wanted to give my buddies here a little extra air time," Thompson said to laughter as he defended the video.
For Thompson, Romney and Huckabee are his biggest obstacles toward establishing himself as the candidate of conservatives.

"I was wrong, I was effectively pro-choice," said Romney, who has said he changed his stance in 2004 during debates on stem cell research. "On abortion, I was wrong."

"If people are looking for somebody in this country who has never made a mistake ... then they ought to find somebody else," he said.

As the front-runner, Giuliani faced questions about gun control, abortion and whether New York taxpayers foot the bill for security he received while the married mayor visited his then-girlfriend, Judith Nathan, now his wife.

Giuliani said he had 24-hour protection as mayor because of threats against him and said all costs incurred were proper.

"I had nothing to do with the handling of their records," he said of how his security detail reported the expenses. "And they were handled, as far as I know, perfectly appropriately."

He didn't, however, offer an explanation for why the tens of thousands of dollars in costs, which aides say were routine expenses for protection for the mayor, were billed to city offices like the Office for People With Disabilities.

Tony Carbonetti, Giuliani's mayoral chief of staff and his top campaign political adviser, said he's asked Joe Lhota, a former city budget director, ex-deputy mayor and a Giuliani campaign adviser, to explain how such accounting practices could have occurred and why security expenses were not billed to the police department.

"These were all legitimate expenses incurred in protecting the mayor, and his police detail covered him wherever he went, 24/7," Carbonetti said in an interview before the debate. "You just do what you do, and the police go with you. That's just a fact of life when you're the mayor of New York."

Later, an aide said that for accounting purposes, the expenses appear to have been temporarily allocated to city offices and paid for out of the mayor's budget but that the police department ultimately picked up the tab and reimbursed the mayor's office at the end of each year.

Giuliani's affair with Nathan, while he was married to second wife Donna Hanover, has become common knowledge.
But the suggestion, true or not, that he was hiding expenses for liaisons with Nathan in little-known city accounts, could open him up to criticism, remind voters of his three marriages and infidelity and tarnish his good-guy image from the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. The report surfaced just hours before debate.

None of Giuliani's rivals raised the issue.
McCain, who has shown no love for Romney during the campaign, seized on Romney's response to a question about the legality of waterboarding as an interrogation technique. Romney said that as a candidate he would not publicly discuss what techniques he would rule out. That prompted McCain, a former Vietnam POW, to assert that waterboarding is indeed torture and should not be tolerated.

"Governor, let me tell you, if we're going to gain the high ground in this world ... we're not going to torture people," McCain said. "How in the world someone could think that that kind of thing could be inflicted on people who are in our custody is absolutely beyond me."

McCain also engaged Ron Paul, a Texas congressman whose libertarian views and opposition to the war have attracted thousands of donors, millions of dollars and a devoted online following.

McCain said Paul is promoting isolationism in calling for the United States to disengage from the war. "We allowed (Adolf) Hitler to come to power with that attitude of isolation," he said.

Paul objected, saying McCain had misunderstood his support for nonintervention with isolationism.
"I want to trade with people, talk with people, travel," Paul replied.

Commentary: On Oprah and our votes

By Clarence Page [Chicago Tribune]
Does Oprah Winfrey's endorsement help Sen. Barack Obama? She doesn't hurt.

The question seems to be on everyone's lips. Obama's campaign announced Monday that Winfrey will join the presidential hopeful next month in the important lead-off states of Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

I doubt that Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, the Democratic front-runner, was thrilled to hear that news. The conventional wisdom holds that celebrity endorsements don't mean much, if anything. But, hey, this is ...Oprah!

We're talking about the queen of all media taking on the diva of Democratic politics.

Winfrey and Clinton are very popular with women and African-Americans. Obama, judging by the polls, needs to win more support from both. If Winfrey can help Obama build his female support without damaging his support from the guys, she could be as valuable of an asset to Obama on the campaign stump as Bill Clinton has been for the former first lady.

That observation was supported Tuesday, a day after Obama's Oprah announcement, in a new national poll of likely African-American voters. Like other national polls, it shows that among black voters Clinton is viewed most favorably and Obama is running a close second.

Clinton's lead is attributed mostly to her strong support from women. The AARP-sponsored poll was conducted by the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, a black-oriented think tank. Clinton received favorable approval ratings from 86 percent of the women in the poll, but only 78 percent of the men. Obama was approved equally by both sexes.

That's the story in South Carolina polls. Clinton has received stronger support from black voters than Obama in that state, thanks again to black women. Since about half of the state's Democratic voters are black and its primary closely follows Iowa and New Hampshire, Obama's chances could hinge on Oprah's ability to help him close that gender gap.

The public seems divided in an interesting way over the impact of Winfrey's blessing. A Pew Research Center poll in September found that most Americans claimed endorsements have no impact on their vote, yet most also thought Winfrey's endorsement would help Obama. In other words, "She won't influence me but I bet she'll influence a lot of other people."

Also interesting in the Pew poll were the groups of voters who said they were most likely to listen to Winfrey: women, African-Americans and young folks ages 18 to 29. Obama is already stronger among the under-30 crowd in the polls, although they're less than half as likely to vote as the over-55 folks who tend to favor Clinton.

The Joint Center's poll also found that "commitment to change" was twice as important to black voters as "experience in public office." Even though black voters tend to favor Clinton, the "change-over-experience" theme could work for Obama down the road, depending on how he plays it.

It's not hard to believe Winfrey could serve as an important change agent to help put Obama over the top. When she endorses, people listen. She's already proved her powers of persuasion with books. Her book club has made best-sellers out of little-known authors. She's made legions of her viewers go out and purchase old classics instead of the CliffsNotes versions that some of us read back in high school.

Celebrity endorsements usually don't matter much because the sort of people who are most likely to be influenced by celebrities tend to be lazy voters. They're not very committed. It's hard for campaigns to get them up off of their cozy couches to go out and stand in line to vote. If she can move Americans to go to bookstores, she might well be able to move a few to vote.

On the question of whether Obama risks trivializing the political process, I think Winfrey's taking a bigger risk. It doesn't hurt Obama to pal around with an entertainment icon who has Winfrey's formidable crossover appeal. It is Winfrey who must dance delicately above the turbulent waters of our country's bitterly polarized politics.

She says her support of Obama is personal, not partisan. I believe her. She has hosted guests of both parties on her shows with equal hospitality. I'm sure she will continue to do so. Still, I won't be holding my breath waiting for Mrs. Clinton to say "yes" again.

LOS ANGELES SENTINEL: The Power of the African American Ballot

Apathy is a dangerous thing. In New Orleans they recently held elections and it is a terrible thing when a city as badly damaged and divided as this city is, gets less than a 20 percent turn out. Reports have shown that New Orleans is still a majority Black city but so few Blacks got involved to let their voices be heard. As we have and continue to discuss, our own community is under attack on lots of different levels and we have some serious issues, which we must address.

Well, sitting on the sidelines doing nothing and bitching about the outcome certainly is not the way to fix our problems. For the past year I have dedicated myself and this paper to making African American Voter Education and Voter Registration one of my priorities. This African American Voter Program has had significant impact in getting Mike Davis elected to the 48th Assembly, it played a key role in Laura Richardson winning as African Americans held on to the Congressional Seat vacated after the death of our beloved Congresswoman and friend Juanita McDonald and the Black vote will also play a key factor in several upcoming races including the 55th Assembly District, the Los Angeles County Supervisor 2nd District and of course the 2008 Presidential Elections.

In 2004 I led a campaign, which registered over 2000 new voters, and at Taste of Soul this year over 3,000 people registered to vote or signed up to get involved in either the Obama or Clinton for President Campaign, and I promise you all this effort will not stop anytime soon.

Right now, we are once again fighting the fight to hold on to the seat vacated by Laura Richardson's election to Congress. This has been a seat held by an African American for several years, from Juanita McDonald to Congresswoman Richardson. And now Councilman Mike Gipson is in a battle with Warren Fuatani.

People constantly want to reduce the significance of African Americans and our voting power. I refuse to believe that our power has been diminished, but I am concerned that we (African Americans) will diminish our own validity by not coming out, taking a stance and getting involved. Again, my brothers and sisters I am asking you to take a stand. I am asking you to get involved in the campaign to elect Mike Gipson to the 55th Assembly District of the California Legislature.

We need to send a message to every political entity and community entity out there, let them know that we will not sit still, we are not going to sit on the sidelines, we are determined to send a message to every mayor, councilman, assemblyperson, or other elected official that you cannot discount us, you cannot take us for granted and we refuse to just sit back and take it and we will not be apathetic in the decisions that matter most in our community. Please, Please, Please my brother and sisters lets get involved and get involved NOW! Let's take a stand, register to vote, get involved in a campaign, make sure every member of your family is registered to vote and then make sure they vote, that is the only way we can stand up and be counted, short of that we might as well sit around and wait to be washed away by a hurricane and then complain about the outcome.

So, whether you agree or disagree, now more than ever I really need your input. I need to hear from you. I need to know what is going on in our community. I also need to know what other stories we need to tell, and what is on your mind. I really do want to hear from you, I want you to "Talk to Danny."

Sincerely,

NEW AMERICA MEDIA: "Hot Chicks Dig Obama "

YO! Youth Outlook Multimedia

SAN FRANCISCO – Even with recent controversy around his supposed drug and alcohol use in high school, Barack Obama has gotten a bump in the polls – at least in Iowa. But his popularity among young people was in full effect when he rolled into town on November 14th. I've been pretty much decided from day one who I want to vote for, but I went to check out what my fellow constituents were like.

The line of people waiting to get into the rally wrapped around a few blocks. It was a strange mix of college students, high school kids, middle class suburban people and a few women dressed as though they were going to a club rather than a political event. Before the doors opened, I talked to some young people outside about Barack and why he has such a cult following with youth.

"He's young, so it's easier to relate to him," said one young woman, sporting a "Hot Chicks Dig Obama" pin. Another young woman added: "He seems to be concerned about the young people and I think other presidential candidates don't think that young people care."

One young man I spoke to vented his anger with the current administration and said charisma was his reason for supporting Barack. "The general population of young people that are going to be voting will probably vote Democratic because it's more progressive," he said. "We're all really pissed off at Bush and his administration." He continued: "Plus, Hillary Clinton just isn't that charismatic." Inside the event, there were stadium-style balcony seats that wrapped around the room and the general admission floor area where people stood in front of the stage awaiting Obama.

In the crowd there were some young women that could have easily been at a Fall Out Boy concert, there were other young people dressed in sensible casual clothing that looked like they were on their way out to a nice dinner, and then some college students with "Barack and Roll" t-shirts – who looked like they were on the way to a kegger.

After about 50 percent of the room filled up, a choir hit the stage. I've always found it interesting how Barack Obama runs his rallies almost like church – the only big difference on this night was that churches don't serve beer. In true sporting event fashion, plastic cups of frothy golden beer and green personal-sized pizza boxes could be seen scattered about the crowd.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There were a few speakers before Obama came on stage. They all talked about him like he was the second coming, JFK and Martin Luther King all wrapped up in one. Between speakers, mostly old soul and funk songs like Sister Sledge's "We Are Family" played over the P.A. People that looked like they have never even heard the word 'dance' before, threw their fists into the air and began to bend their elbows and knees in some bizarre ski stance move, like it hurt and was very pleasurable to them at the same time.

Somewhere between the songs "Ain't No Mountain High Enough" and "It's Your Thang," the wave broke out in the balcony and I could help but wish I brought a foam finger. When Barack finally did get on stage, the crowd erupted. Signs flew up in the air and everyone was out of their seat like someone hit a game winning shot. He greeted the crowd casually with "Hey!" and "What's up?" When he began to actually speak, I could tell why people like him so much. He definitely has a way of engaging his audience. He paced back and forth on the stage – making the classic politician fist with one hand and holding the mic in the other.

But not everyone was completely satisfied with what Barack had to say. One young woman pointed out that in his speech Barack said nothing about immigration, which is a big issue that hits close to home with a lot of Californians. It was also pointed out by another woman that Barack said nothing about women's rights, another hot topic in San Francisco.

The great majority of the young people that attended seemed satisfied. A schoolteacher from a prep school in Oakland who brought her entire class of students summed it up nicely. "Young people are the ones that have changed all the world, if you look through out history it's the young people that have made the change," she said. So, will young people be the one's who will decide this election by wearing clever Obama t-shirts and pins all the way to the polls? It's too early to predict, but one thing's for sure: B-money knows how to throw a serious party.

THE BOSTON GLOBE

Questions at crunch time

By Dan Payne | November 29, 2007

35 DAYS TO GO and a new poll in Iowa shows Barack Obama has jumped into the lead with 30 percent; Hillary Clinton is at 26 percent; and John Edwards has 22 percent, according to an ABC News/Washington Post poll. Clinton people say the poll is an outlier, but admit that Iowa is her toughest state.

Consider this: Asked who best understands "the problems of people like you," 30 percent of Iowans said Obama, 25 percent said Edwards, and only 20 percent said Clinton.

Change or experience? The poll shows 55 percent of Iowans believe a "new direction and new ideas" are needed, compared with 33 percent who wanted "strength and experience." That's a 12-point shift toward change since July. In perfect triangulation, Clinton says she has the experience to produce change.

Three out of four Iowans say they are just getting by or falling behind financially. They are, as President Bush once said, struggling to "put food on their families."

What's driving change? Consider the country under Cheney-Bush: We're killing and dying in a disastrous war in Iraq, we're hated around the world, gas and oil prices are soaring, home prices are falling, the mortgage mess is chilling the economy, the earth is warming, China is selling us lead-laced toys, Pakistan is in turmoil, and Iran wants nuclear weapons. In such a world, saying you know your way around Washington is like saying you know how to hit yourself in the head with a ball-peen hammer.

Sports cars or sedans? Democrats drool over sports cars but buy practical sedans. Democrats have a history of nominating safe candidates. See Hubert Humphrey over Eugene McCarthy, Jimmy Carter over Mo Udall, Walter Mondale over Gary Hart, Mike Dukakis over Jesse Jackson, Bill Clinton over Jerry Brown, Al Gore over Bill Bradley, John Kerry over Howard Dean. This favors Hillary, but white Iowans may want to show their lack of prejudice by standing up in caucuses for an African-American.

Who's your second choice? This is crucial because Iowa's rules say a candidate must get at least 15 percent in a caucus for votes to count; if your pick doesn't make it, you have a viable alternative. The ABC/Post poll showed 34 percent say Obama is their second choice, 28 percent Edwards, 15 percent Clinton. One edge for Edwards: He's done this before, in 2004. Bill Clinton never contested Iowa and its 1,781 precinct meetings.

What happens after Iowa? If Hillary Clinton wins big in Iowa, the race could end right there; if she doesn't, it will go on for a while. Five days later is New Hampshire, a good state for the Clintons. Michigan is next on Jan. 15 and Obama, Edwards, Bill Richardson, and Joe Biden have all removed their names from its ballot. Michigan is a rogue state whose date violates national party rules. But the real reason for bailing out is to curry favor with date-obsessed Iowa and New Hampshire.

Hillary remains on the Michigan ballot and can shrewdly say she won't campaign there and decline to say whether the votes count until she sees how many she gets. The GOP is holding its primary that day so votes will be tabulated.

What will stick? Conventional wisdom says attacks don't go over well in Iowa. Clinton and Obama didn't get the memo. Hillary has been belittling Obama's foreign policy experience, while claiming as first lady she made 80 official foreign visits.

Obama says Hillary campaigns from a "poll-driven" defensive crouch, refusing to take clear positions on healthcare or the Iraq war, out of fear that she will be attacked in a general election.

If this bickering continues, Edwards could become the alternative, except. . .
Has Edwards jumped the shark? After running four years ago in unfiltered sunlight, Edwards has grown darkly anti-Hillary. It's a shame because he's been raising important issues - poverty, the stranglehold of money in Washington, truly universal healthcare, and federal policies that have cost working-class people their jobs and homes.

If Edwards has jumped the shark - i.e., gone too far - it may be because one of his top advisers is Joe Trippi of the 2004 Howard Dean campaign. Trippi's arrival coincides with the dawn of a new, angry populist Edwards. Yeeeeee-Haw!

Who you gonna buy? Here's the race in a nutshell: Hillary's got her husband stumping for her in Iowa. Big surprise. Obama will tour the state with Oprah Winfrey, who's never endorsed anyone for office. Tiebreaker: When was the last time average women bought millions of books recommended by Bill Clinton?

Is Rev. Jackson an Obama supporter or not?

I can't figure at out times whether the Rev. Jesse Jackson Sr. is truly a supporter of Sen. Barack Obama or not.

A couple of months ago he was busted for saying that Obama was "acting white" for his so-called refusal to speak out on the Jena 6 case. In fact, Obama did speak out on the case and was on record.

But yesterday, Jackson took all Democrats to task, except for John Edwards, for not addressing black issues.
In a column that ran in the Chicago Sun-Times, Jackson said: "the Democratic candidates -- with the exception of John Edwards, who opened his campaign in New Orleans' Ninth Ward and has made addressing poverty central to his campaign -- have virtually ignored the plight of African Americans in this country. The catastrophic crisis that engulfs the African-American community goes without mention. No urban agenda is given priority. When thousands of African Americans marched in protest in Jena, La., not one candidate showed up.

"Democratic candidates are talking about health care and raising the minimum wage, but they aren't talking about the separate and stark realities facing African Americans."

Now I get Jackson's position; he ran as a black candidate for president in 1984 and 1988, and we all knew he couldn't win. He ran as a "statement candidate" who had a tremendous effect on down ballot races.

But Obama isn't running to make a statement. He's actually trying to get the nomination. He's raised $80 million, and is now leading in the polls in Iowa, and is cutting into Sen. Hillary Clinton's lead in New Hampshire.

Now, Clinton and Obama have both made speeches, and issued policy statements on a variety of issues of concern to African Americans. So what in the world is Rev talking about?

Jackson mentioned education, poverty, the plight of black men and the criminal justice system in his column. I've heard multiple speeches from Obama and Clinton on those issues. So how are they not getting addressed? Now how on one hand can folks say he hasn't said a word about black issues, when the record disputes that.

I get why Jackson is making a mountain out of a mole hill. This is in his focus. But him becoming the story is ridiculous because right now, Obama has momentum, and when I turned on CNN on Tuesday, all I heard was Jackson criticizing the Democrat candidates.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After Jackson's "white" comment in South Carolina, he issued a statement reaffirming his support for Obama. And what did he do yesterday after his column? The same thing.

This back and forth with Jackson over Obama points to a serious problem, and frankly, it's one that Rev is going to have to deal with. He wants a much larger role in the Obama campaign, but Jackson has to accept the reality that Obama has to be careful as to this issue.

Like it or not, Jackson is a volatile figure outside the black community. And Obama has to clearly appeal to non-black voters for him to have any chance of winning the Democratic nomination. I concur that he has to speak to black issues - and have written as such - but he can't run as the "black candidate."

When the Democratic candidates, and specifically Obama, discuss healthcare, the Iraq War and the economy, does that not include black folks? At one point are we going to wake up and realize this?

Joint Center releases survey of likely black presidential primary voters
Good news for Clinton and Obama in Joint Center poll

The Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, the nation's leading think tank on African American issues, released their "2007 National Survey of Likely Black Presidential Primary Voters" and it bodes well for Democratic frontrunners, Sens. Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton.

Background: The survey is a national survey of 750 black likely primary/caucus voters, and was done between Oct. 5 and Nov. 2, 2007. "Respondents were asked their views on important national problems, issues in the campaign, and candidates for both the Democratic and Republican presidential nominations. The survey methodology is described in an accompanying appendix. The Joint Center conducted the survey with the support of the AARP."

Here are the highlights:

- Clinton had the highest favorable rating of any presidential candidate with 83 percent of black likely voters. Only 9.7 percent saw her unfavorably. Of that, 86 percent of black women viewed her favorably and only 7 percent unfavorably. Obama? He drew 74.4 percent favorable and 10.1 percent unfavorable.

- Black voters aren't too high on the Republicans. Former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani was tops among the GOP, but only 27.1 percent viewed him favorably and 42.7 percent unfavorably. The least negative among black voters? Former Tennessee Sen. Fred Thompson.

- Most important problem facing the nation? War in Iraq at 28 percent; healthcare came in at 20 percent; and jobs came in at 15 percent. Education was fourth at 10 percent. Interestingly, less than 1 percent chose immigration as "the most important national problem." This stands in stark contrast to the center's pre-2004 survey of black adults - "not likely voters," they said

- that showed jobs and the economy tops and the war in Iraq second.
Clinton has been touting her experience as the most important factor in the race, but for black voters, that isn't the most important issue.

"A strong majority (63 percent) of black voters said what matters most to them in the presidential candidate is a commitment to change; less than a third indicated that a candidate's experience in elective office mattered most to them," according to the survey.

That should be good news to Obama, who has made change the leading focus of his campaign in an effort to distinguish him from Clinton.

Now when it comes to President Bush, "abysmal" was the word the Joint Center used to describe his ratings among likely black voters with "only 11 percent rating his work excellent or good, while 87 percent give him negative marks--including 58 percent who rate his work as poor. Black women voters (61 percent), those with more than a college degree (72 percent), and those making more than $75,000 (72 percent) were most negative toward the president."

Ouch!

When it comes to African Americans and their views about Democrats, it is no contest.
- "African Americans favor the Democrats over the Republicans on healthcare (75 to 11 percent), Iraq (72 to 14 percent), the economy and jobs (70 to 15 percent), terrorism and national security (60 to 23 percent), Social Security (72 to 13 percent), immigration (60 to 19 percent), taxes (71 to 15 percent), education (72 and 14 percent), and moral values (63 to 17 percent). Democrats are favored over the GOP even on the GOP's signature issues of terrorism and moral values."

- "African Americans continue to identify strongly with the Democratic Party with 84 percent being self-described Democrats and 11 percent identifying with the Republicans; 54 percent of those surveyed described themselves as strong Democrats, while only seven percent were strong Republicans. In 2007, likely black primary voters were also strongly liberal in their political orientation with 41 percent describing themselves that way; 36 percent were self-described moderates and 21 percent conservatives. Conservatism has lost some of its brand strength among African Americans: In Joint Center surveys of black adults conducted during the late 1990s, between 35 and 40 percent described themselves as conservative in their political orientation."

Bottom line: Democrats have lots of good news in this survey, and the GOP has a lot of work to do. But it also bodes well for both Clinton and Obama, who are far and away the preferred choices among likely black voters.

Commentary: Clinton camp has problems doing their math
WASHINGTON (CNN) — I just finished watching the Monday night piece on Sen. Barack Obama that aired on ABC's Nightline. During the broadcast, anchor Terry Moran read a comment from the Clinton campaign that said if the junior senator from Illinois was elected president, he would have less experience than any president in the 20th century.

Here is what Deputy Communications Director Phil Singer wrote Tuesday after an Obama foreign policy speech:

"With the critical foreign policy challenges America faces in the world today, voters will decide whether Senator Obama, who served in the Illinois State Senate just three years ago and would have less experience than any President since World War II, has the strength and experience to be the next president. Sen. Clinton, who has traveled to 82 countries as a representative of the United States and serves on the Armed Services Committee, is ready to lead starting on Day One."

Really?

George W. Bush only held elected office for six years before becoming president. He was elected governor of Texas in 1994 and won the presidency – OK, liberal bloggers, the Supreme Court ruled in his favor – in 2000.

Obama is in his 11th year as an elected officeholder – eight years in the Illinois state senate, followed by three as a U.S. senator. Clinton is in her seventh year of elected office.

So the question has to be asked: Is the Clinton campaign struggling with their math, or hoping we all can't add?
If the Clinton camp is saying state experience doesn't matter, does that apply to Bush, who never served at the federal level prior to coming to the White House; President Jimmy Carter, who was governor of Georgia before residing at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue; and even her husband, Bill Clinton, who was governor and attorney general of Arkansas before being elected in 1992?

I sent Singer an email asking for a clarification. I'll let you know if he gets back to me.

'Gay question' general linked to Clinton
By: Kenneth P. Vogel
November 29, 2007 06:08 AM EST
The retired general who asked about gays and lesbians serving in the military at the CNN/YouTube Republican debate on Wednesday is a co-chair of Hillary Clinton 's National Military

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Veterans group.

Retired Brig. Gen. Keith H. Kerr was named a co-chair of the group this month, according to a campaign press release.

He was also active in John F. Kerry's 2004 campaign for president.

Kerr asked candidates "why you think that American men and women in uniform are not professional enough to serve with gays and lesbians."

After the debate former Education Secretary Bill Bennett, said on a CNN panel that he was being told Kerr was involved with the Democratic presidential campaign of Clinton, a New York senator.

CNN anchor Anderson Cooper, who moderated the debate and the panel, said that if that was the case, CNN should have identified Kerr as such.

David Bohrman, a CNN senior vice president and executive producer of the debate, later said: "We regret this, and apologize to the Republican candidates. We never would have used the general's question had we known that he was connected to any presidential candidate."

Kerr told CNN that he had not done work for the Clinton campaign, and CNN verified before the debate that he had not contributed money to any candidate, the broadcaster said in a blog post after the debate.

Kerry told CNN he is a member of the Log Cabin Republicans and was representing no one other than himself, CNN said.

A Nov. 11 press release retrieved from the website of the non-partisan magazine Campaigns & Elections lists Kerr as one of nearly 50 co-chairs of "Veterans and Military Retirees for Hillary."

Clinton's campaign did not respond to an e-mail asking about Kerr's role in her campaign or whether he was acting on behalf of the campaign.

Kerr also was on 2004 Democratic presidential nominee John Kerry's National Veterans Steering Committee, according to a campaign press release retrieved from the website of George Washington University.

And Kerr appears to be an active opponent of the U.S. military's current stance on gays and lesbians serving the military, the so-called "don't ask, don't tell" policy.

He appeared on the now-defunct CNN partner network CNNfn in Dec. 2003 to discuss the tenth anniversary of the policy. According to a transcript, he called it "a tremendous waste of personnel, a tremendous waste of financial resources for the United States."

Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), the ranking member of the House Armed Services Committee, got first crack at Kerr's question. He said he thought having openly gay men and lesbian women in the military "would be bad for unit cohesion."

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee , answering next, basically agreed.

Cooper then singled out former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney , who in 1994 said he looked forward to the day gays and lesbians could serve openly in the military.

Romney said times have changed. Though he said he laughed when he first heard talk of the "don't ask, don't tell" policy, and didn't think it would work, he said: "You know what? It's been there now for 15 years and it seems to have worked."

Cooper then turned to Kerr and asked whether he felt he got an answer to his question.

Kerr responded: "With all due respect, I did not get an answer from the candidates. American men and women in the military are professional enough to serve with gays and lesbians.... Today, don't ask, don't tell is destructive to our military policy."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a decorated Vietnam veteran, got the last word on "don't ask, don't tell."
He said high-ranking military officials "almost unanimously, they tell me that this present policy is working. That we have the best military in history, we have the bravest, most professional, best-prepared and that this policy ought to be continued because it's working."

CLINTON-MINISTERS
Clinton endorsed by S.C. ministers as rivals seek black support in early voting state
SPARTANBURG, S.C. (AP) — Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton picked up endorsements from dozens of black ministers Tuesday in South Carolina, an early voting state where she and rival Barack Obama have been courting the critical black vote.

The clergy were drawn to the New York senator for her views on health care, jobs and other issues, said a state representative who helped organize the endorsements. "They felt this was the best candidate addressing their concerns," said state Rep. Harold Mitchell, a Democrat from this northern part of the state.

Nearly half of South Carolina's Democratic primary voters are black, and ministers can play a huge role in shaping the political direction of their congregations. More than 60 ministers gathered with Clinton on a stage at a hotel and her campaign said 80 were in the room where the endorsements were announced.

Clinton, in a wide-ranging speech to a crowd of more than 450, spoke about her plans to expand health care, improve public education and boost the image of the U.S. She said she would send emissaries around the globe — and mentioned former Secretary of State Colin Powell as "someone I know very well" — to send a message that the era of "cowboy diplomacy is over."

DODD-FUNDS
Dodd eligible for public matching funds
WASHINGTON (AP) — Democratic presidential candidate Chris Dodd became eligible Tuesday for federal matching money to help finance a campaign that is banking on a surprise finish in Iowa.

The Federal Election Commission announced that Dodd had met the minimum requirement to receive public funds from the Presidential Public Funding Program, which is financed by taxpayers who set aside $3 for the fund in their tax returns.

Dodd is seeking to emerge as an alternative to better-financed rivals like Hillary Rodham Clinton, Barack Obama and John Edwards. As of Sept. 30, when candidates filed their latest financial reports, Dodd had total receipts of $13.6 million. He raised $1.5 million in the third quarter, covering July-September.

The presidential fund matches the first $250 of each individual primary contribution to an eligible candidate. To accept the money, candidates must agree to an overall spending limit of about $50 million and must meet spending thresholds in individuals states as well. The limits do not include money spent on staff, fundraising and several other costs that could significantly increase the base limit.

Dodd joins Edwards as the only two Democrats to be declared eligible for matching funds so far. Obama and Clinton do not plan to accept public money, freeing them from the spending limits. Republican presidential candidates John McCain and Tom Tancredo have also been declared eligible for public funds. McCain said Monday he had not yet decided whether to participate in the program.

Ease of voter registration one more quirk in Iowa, N.H. presidential nominating contests
DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) — It's Jan. 3 in Iowa and you decide, what the heck, I'm going to a precinct caucus.
Not affiliated with a political party? Not registered? Not even old enough to vote?
No problem. Come and help choose the nation's next president.
In yet another quirk of Iowa's caucus system, all citizens can participate as long as they sign a statement attesting to residency in the precinct and show that they'll be 18 in time for the general election.

"It has not been a problem," said state Democratic Party spokeswoman Carrie Giddins.
Some people do have a problem with the ease of registering for New Hampshire's leadoff primary, which follows Iowa's caucuses by five days. New Hampshire allows same-day registration at the polls, has no minimum residency period and defines a voter's home as the place where he or she sleeps most nights or intends to return after a temporary absence.

Obama's Racial Identity Still An Issue

(CBS) Barack Obama has said that the big city cab drivers who once refused to pick him up had no doubt about his blackness back then, nor should anyone else now, CBS News correspondent Dean Reynolds reports.

Campaigning, he addresses the race issue without hesitation, once even mimicking gangbangers - he criticized their work ethic: "Why I gotta do it? Why you didn't ask Pookie to do it?" he said.

He quotes Martin Luther King and occasionally slips into the cadence of a black preacher, but recent polls show Hillary Clinton is the choice of more black Democrats, and it's clear that Obama's racial identity gives pause to some. He is not the descendant of African slaves, but is the son of a white mother and a Kenyan father, so he alone gets questions about just who he is.

"My black activist friends from here to Boston say that you are not black, you are multiracial, and I want to know how you self-identify?" he was asked at a recent event.

Obama replies: "I self-identify as African American - that's how I'm treated and that's how I'm viewed. I'm proud of it."

"The issue of whether he is black enough is not the primary issue," said Michael Fauntroy, a professor of public policy at George Mason University. "The issue is whether he has enough experience."

Besides, Obama may have other strengths. "He is seen as more palatable and more acceptable to larger numbers of white voters," Fauntroy said.

Of course, there are whites who will never vote for Obama because he is black.

"I don't want to sound prejudiced or anything, but for one, I am not going to vote for a colored man to be our president," said one South Carolina voter.

When asked if this country would vote for a black man for the highest office in the land, Sen. Obama deflects the question, suggesting merely raising it is a disservice to the American electorate.

But the American electorate has never had anyone quite like Barack Obama to consider.

CLINTON GETS SOME PULPIT POWER

SPARTANBURG, S.C. (Posted Nov. 28, 2007) – Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) visited South Carolina Tuesday, which will be the first southern state to hold its presidential primary. She stopped in Spartanburg to pick up endorsements from some 50 ministers whose congregations cover the northern region of the state. The delegation of pastors flanked Clinton on stage before a crowd of more than 300 in the Spartanburg Marriott Hotel ballroom.

A political pep rally with pastors is a winning combination for any campaign. But the one who stood out to me was the event coordinator. South Carolina State Rep. Harold Mitchell (D) had first endorsed Clinton's top rival, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.).

Mitchell told me his switch wasn't "a quick change" but after finding Clinton was closer to the issues he cared about, it just seemed like the right thing to do.

Mitchell said when he testified at a hearing in Washington, D.C., on environmental justice, he listen to what Clinton had to say and found she supported the same state projects he was working on. Not just on this issue but other issues as well.

"She came back and put together a trust fund for affordable housing; she signed onto the reauthorization of Hope Six, an initiative to spark home ownership, and she has the leadership and experience," Mitchell said.

You can never underestimate how a candidate relates to the folks when they meet face to face. And Clinton worked the room and clearly roped in a few votes. After her remarks, she shook hands with the crowd and exchanged pleasantries.

Bertha Robinson from Moore, S.C., told me, "I like her ideas, and she would be an excellent president; she's for the middle class and underprivileged."

John Teamer, of Spartanburg, was still undecided. "I wanted to see what she's like; I want a president that's for everybody."

Y&R's Drucilla may have disappeared, but her portrayer, Victoria Rowell, is very much alive and visible as she has been traveling around the country speaking out in support for Senator Hillary Clinton. She has visited South Carolina as well as other southern states, and heads this week to New Hampshire speaking about her support for Clinton.

Rowell, who is also best-selling author of "The Women Who Raised Me" about her experiences growing up in the foster care system, is a practiced public speaker who supports issues relating to women and children, African-Americans, as well as the arts community. In a recent speech, she compared Hillary Clinton to the women who raised her - strong, graceful, and doing something worthwhile.

Hillary Clinton first met Victoria back in 1997, and The Young and the Restless alum has supported the Senator's efforts to make adoption more affordable, offer tax-incentives to families adopting children with special needs and provide caregivers with additional support systems.

Many in the audience become moved by Rowell's speeches, in which she claims Americans need someone in office who supports children's causes. While speaking, she even refers to Hillary Clinton as "President Clinton" on occasion!

It is said that many Y&R fans turn up at the rallies to hear Victoria Rowell speak and she spends up to an hour afterward chatting and signing autographs.

Although, Victoria alludes to this campaign as being a reason for taking time away from Y&R , she only jokes when asked about a return to the daytime sudser, such as in a recent soap

What About Shirley Chisholm...and Her 1972 Presidential Campaign?
As we draw closer to the 2008 presidential primaries - with Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama trading one-liners and fighting for percentage points - it's important to look back and pay homage to someone who paved the way for both of them.

That person is Shirley Chisholm.
Like most people moderately well-versed in American politics, I thought I knew all about Shirley Chisholm. First black woman elected to Congress. First African American woman to run for President on a major party ticket . Those two bare-bones sentences don't nearly do her justice.

If she ran today, she'd have twice the grassroots buzz surrounding her that Ron Paul enjoys.
Her campaign slogan, "Unbought and Unbossed," spelled it out.
And if you don't get my meaning, here's an example: In her freshman year in Congress, you know how they hand out those committee assignments to new members? And you're pretty much supposed to take your assignment, smile, and be grateful for the honor? Well, Shirley Chisholm was assigned to a subcommittee of the House Agriculture Committee.

And what does agriculture have to do with her constituents back in Brooklyn, smack-dab in the middle of New York City? Not much.

And that's why she said, "No...I'm not going to take this assignment." She looked the powers-that-be in the eye (white men in those days) and just said no.

That was who she was - determined, committed, not a woman to be pushed around. And she was way, way ahead of her time.
That's why I'm surprised that more women (and men) aren't talking about her this campaign cycle and referencing her accomplishments.

She was the first woman to have her name placed in nomination for President at the Democratic National Convention.
She was the first African American to campaign for the Democratic nomination.
Clinton and Obama are campaigning on her legacy - a ground-breaking presidential race she knew she'd never win.
But as she explained, "Somebody has to be the first."

Is Barack Obama just another high-toned liberal doomed to failure? [Original]

All presidential candidates have their signature rhetorical moves, and Barack Obama's has been to make a virtue of defying pressure groups.

In a recent debate, he boasted of telling a crowd of automakers—rather than "some environmental group," as he put it—that we need to raise the fuel efficiency standards of cars.

He has also hyped his frankness in urging merit pay on teachers and in lecturing African-American groups that unwed fathers need to act more responsibly.

Never mind that none of these positions is terribly controversial, even among liberal Democrats.

In touting these acts of supposed rebellion, Obama isn't really seeking to stake out dangerous ground; he's trying to score points for appearing to brave powerful constituencies on behalf of a larger common good.

Telling Detroit to go green may (or may not) bruise him in the Michigan primary, but overall it will help him much more by buffing his aura as a truth-teller and healer.

Pundits call these gestures "Sister Souljah" moments, in honor of Bill Clinton's 1992 speech before the Rainbow Coalition blasting the rapper for seeming to advocate black-on-white violence.

But that label doesn't really apply to Obama's gestures. Clinton's comments were tied closely to a specific subject matter—racial politics.

Though arguably opportunistic, they were aimed squarely at Reagan Democrats who felt their party had become too tolerant of black radicalism.

The particular objects of Obama's attacks, in contrast, are irrelevant. It's the larger image of candor on behalf of the general interest that he's after.

A more apt precedent, then, is the rhetoric of a different Democratic standard-bearer from the past - Adlai Stevenson - who, not coincidentally, also embodies the strain of high-minded reformism that, of all liberal traditions, influences Obama most.

Stevenson, the famously virtuous Illinois governor who nobly went down to defeat against Dwight Eisenhower in 1952 and 1956, remains the model Democratic loser.

He was the sensible champion of civility who gallantly upheld the liberal banner in a conservative age, even while getting drubbed at the polls.

One of his favorite tactics was to proclaim his ability to flout his audiences and instead act on behalf of the whole public.

"I remember the night in Dallas when I spoke to Texans of my views of tidelands oil," he said in a televised speech on election eve, 1952.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I remember the crowd in Detroit when I said I would be the captive of all of the American people and no one else. I remember the evening in the railroad station in New Haven when I identified a powerful Democratic leader as not my kind of Democrat. ...

"I have done my best frankly and forthrightly." The same theme marked TV commercials like this one—an ad that also lends some insight into why Stevenson had so much trouble that year.

The appeal to the greater good, as opposed to sectarian interest, was typical of Stevenson—and of a persistent persuasion within liberalism that has now given rise to Obama's candidacy.

It's an appeal that aims not only to create an image of principled candor, but, equally important, to distinguish the candidate from the familiar Democratic interest-group pluralism.

Whereas most Democratic politicians have succeeded by building alliances of disparate groups, each with its own pet issues, Stevenson's approach tended to deny or elide the fact that the demands of particular groups often conflict.

Instead, he was partial to language about "the common good" and "the public interest" and spoke loftily to "all Americans."

This sensibility wasn't inherently hostile to Democratic constituencies like blacks, blue-collar workers, or immigrants whose interests often fell outside conventional notions of the "common" interest, but it did tend to marginalize their concerns. Conversely, it resonated most with intellectuals and well-educated upscale professionals.

Obama exhibits other elements of this Stevensonian style as well. It's a style—an ideology, really—that links the quest for common ground with a language of enlightened reason.

It disdains the passionate and sometimes ugly politics of backroom deals, negative campaigning, sordid tactics, and appeals to emotion. It extols sacrifice and denigrates self-interest.

This tradition, of course, predates Stevenson. Its roots go back to the classical or civic republicanism that permeated American thought in the revolutionary era.

But the real precursors of Obama and Stevenson are the educated, middle-class reformers of the Gilded Age known as the Mugwumps.

The Mugwumps were liberal professionals and gentlemen of the late 19th century who tried to transform both the economic arrangements of the industrial age, with their deepening social inequities, and the machine-dominated political system, with its patronage and corruption.

They were the forebears of the Progressives of the next generation with whom they shared many qualities.

Both generations were, in the main, comfortable, noble-minded, often moralistic, usually sensible in their policy prescriptions (the civil service system, clean elections).

But they were also elitist, given to condescension toward lower classes and minorities, and often blind to those virtues that the parties and their machines did possess.

Mugwump-style reformism went into eclipse during the New Deal. Franklin Roosevelt and his circle preferred a strategy of coalition building that had roots in Democratic urban machine politics.

In their policies, they focused unsentimentally on economics—passing programs that would put food on people's tables. They dispensed with the Mugwumps' and Progressives' moral uplift in favor of a pragmatic approach.

With Stevenson, though, Mugwump liberalism reasserted itself—launching an era in which it would reside almost exclusively within the Democratic Party.

The original Mugwumps had been Republicans, and the Progressives included at least as many Republicans as Democrats; even Calvin Coolidge displayed Mugwump tendencies.

But after Stevenson, the Democratic Party furnished most of the presidential candidates and national figures who spoke the language of civic obligation, of suppressing group interest for the common good, of restoring an elevated political discourse.

From Eugene McCarthy in 1968 to Paul Tsongas in 1992 to Bill Bradley in 2000, these figures typically commanded strong followings among students and upscale liberals.

But they generated comparatively less enthusiasm among labor and African-Americans, among other core Democratic voters.

No one would deny the admirable side of the Mugwump inheritance: the policies it helped to implement, the idealism it represents, the commitment to principles like clean campaigning and good government that lie at its core.

Yet the failures of Stevenson and his heirs pose a warning as well to those like Obama who would adopt this ideology, rhetoric, and style.

For it was no coincidence that Stevenson and others failed as campaigners; his failure was rooted in his attitude toward politics.

In 1952 and again in 1956, Stevenson tried to avoid negative campaigning at first, considering it undignified and an insult to voters. (He felt the same way about TV ads.)

And so when he finally, of necessity, resorted to attacking Eisenhower—mainly by going after his running mate, Richard Nixon—Stevenson came off as desperate and hypocritical.

The same was true for Tsongas and Bradley when they flailed haplessly at Bill Clinton and Al Gore.

Today, Barack Obama finds himself in a similar bind to those men. If he continues to heed the advice of friendly pundits to attack Hillary Clinton more forcefully, he risks undermining the very premise of his campaign.

He would be tainting his image as a new kind of politician while failing to land his punches, because in the end he's not really a street fighter.

What he doesn't seem to understand—as Stevenson did not—is that democratic politics fairly demands a measure of thrust and parry, of appeals to self-interest, and of playing the political game. And so does being a good president.

WHY BLACKS LIKE HILLARY OVER OBAMA
Bill Clinton led his send-off speech at the Dem 2000 convention for Al Gore, with the fact that under the second term of his administration, blacks saw a higher growth of income than whites.....

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

During the Bush Years, they gave it all back.....
Therefore to the average Afro American, this election is extremely important, from purely an economic reason.....African Americans fared well under the first Clinton. They put their faith, if not their fervor into Al Gore, and look where we are today....Bottom line, they feel they need to back someone who will win with white voters ....

Of course they are proud of Obama. Even more, they are proud of his high poll standings and his ability to earn money.....equal almost to that of Hillary Clinton herself.....

But when it comes to keeping track of how many promising Black candidates actually win .....their memories are better at keeping score than most whites.....Likewise they are sharper because of their struggles, on who is capable and not capable of delivering upon their campaign promises.....

Bill did...and that leads a lot of credence that his wife will do the same.....Her experience is slightly more prodigious than her husband's. She seems to have the Rights' nod to the presidency, implying at best the Republicans will try to mount a Dole sized Campaign to keep from acquiescing entirely.

Obama on the other hand, was a state senator, and then a freshman Senator, until he started taking time off to campaign...How will he be able to effectively work Capitol Hill better than Hillary, when what is necessary will be the reversal of all things Bush, and a return to the tax policy, environmental policy, social policy that proved to raise ALL RACES AND ECONOMIC STRATAS at the same time.....something no one else has ever been able to do.

They do not need another candidate to stumble out of the gate . Therefore though they like Obama, as for right now, the money is on Hillary.....

But that could change after Iowa...where currently Obama is in the lead .....If Obama can show the curse is lifted and in a state where there are very few African Americans to be found...that a black can beat the wife of the most popular president ever,.....those allegiances can shift.....But Obama must win in Iowa, sort of the same way Kennedy had to win in West Virginia, (proving once and for all back in 1960 that a Catholic did have a shot at the presidency. Boy have we come a long way.....)

Black voters, argues Jim Clyburn, House Majority Whip, are aware that they make up a minority of the population in the United States and that to win the White House in 2008 the Democratic candidate must be able to demonstrate considerable appeal among white voters if Iowa goes Obama, then Blacks may see him as capable of making it all the way. If that vision becomes reality, then their support will switch to that candidate who can win the White House in 2008.....even if he is black.....

OBAMA 'THE MAN FOR THE MOMENT'

Needle Exchange Action May Be Imminent

Last spring at the National African American Drug Policy Coalition summit here in Washington, the question was asked of Donna Christian-Christensen (Congressional Delegate from USVI, the closest thing the territories have to US Representatives), a physician and chair of the Congressional Black Caucus' Health Braintrust, what the prospects were for repealing the ban on use of federal AIDS grant funds to support needle exchange. Her answer was, "We're going to give it a good try." I took that to mean "it's not going to happen this time."

The issue has made some progress however, at least as it affects us here in the District of Columbia, where a particularly infamous part of the annual appropriations bill prevents DC from spending even its own locally-collected tax funds on needle exchange appears to be on its way to getting repealed , thanks to positive action by a House subcommittee that drafted the new appropriations bill. I know better than to take it as a given that repeal will make it all the way through. But it is looking pretty good, and at the PreventionWorks! anniversary party this evening -- attended by new PW executive director Ken Vail -- AIDS Action lobbyist Bill McColl informed the crowd that it could hit the floor within a few days.

Earlier this year we reported that Hillary Clinton was noncommittal about lifting the ban during a videotaped exchange at a private forum with prominent AIDS activists. The exchange was fascinating; after several pointed back-and-forths with Housing Works executive director Charles King, Sen. Clinton directly acknowledged that it was political concerns only that accounted for her position (though the kinds of concerns that can't necessarily be dismissed offhand). Sen. Obama, by contrast, had stated his support for lifting the ban.

This week Clinton took the plunge and made strong pro-needle exchange promises in a campaign statement on AIDS funding . What would ultimately happen with this in a Clinton presidency, or any Democratic presidency, is probably hard to predict -- politics is still politics. But the fact that the Democratic candidates are lining up to support the issue has McColl feeling cautiously optimistic that the Democratic Congress won't drop the ball on the DC language at least.

And it's encouraging for all of us about the long-term. The federal needle exchange restriction came to a boil during the Clinton administration, when the findings needed to lift the ban -- needle exchange doesn't increase drug use, but does reduce the spread of HIV -- were made by the administration, but not acted on. Some advocates believe that if Donna Shalala had been on a certain Air Force One flight, instead of Barry McCaffrey, that it would have happened. It took a change in Congress to even get the issue back onto the radar screen; more may be needed to actually get the law changed.

Still, let's keep our fingers crossed for the DC ban to be lifted, maybe even by the end of the year. Assuming that happens: Let's Do Heroin! (That was sarcasm, in case anyone didn't realize.)

Hillary Leads GOP Rivals in United States

November 29, 2007

(Angus Reid Global Monitor) - Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton holds the upper hand in the 2008 United States presidential election, according to a poll by Gallup released by USA Today. At least 49 per cent of respondents would vote for the New York senator in head-to-head contests against four prospective Republican rivals.

Rodham Clinton holds a five-point edge over former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani, a six-point lead over Arizona senator John McCain, a 13-point advantage over actor and former Tennessee senator Fred Thompson, and a 16-point lead over former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney.

On Nov. 27, in an op-ed published in the Chicago Sun-Times, African American leader Jesse Jackson expressed disappointment with several Democratic presidential hopefuls, writing, "The Democratic candidates—with the exception of John Edwards, who opened his campaign in New Orleans' Ninth Ward and has made addressing poverty central to his campaign—have virtually ignored the plight of African Americans in this country. The catastrophic crisis that engulfs the African-American community goes without mention."

In American elections, candidates require 270 votes in the Electoral College to win the White House. In November 2004, Republican George W. Bush earned a second term after securing 286 electoral votes from 31 states. Democratic nominee John Kerry received 252 electoral votes from 19 states and the District of Columbia.

Bush is ineligible for a third term in office. The next presidential election is scheduled for November 2008.

Middle-income blacks are downwardly mobile

THE ECONOMIST: EDITORIAL COMMENTARY

Some black Americans are doing very well. Barack Obama is pulling ahead of Hillary Clinton in Iowa. Tiger Woods is the world's best-paid athlete. Stan O'Neal was given a $160 million golden parachute as he was ejected from Merrill Lynch last month.

But these exceptional folk are indeed exceptional. For members of the black middle class, the news is gloomier. New research suggests that their grip on affluence is precarious.

The Economic Mobility Project, an arm of the impeccably non-partisan Pew Charitable Trusts, compares contemporary Americans' family income (based on surveys conducted between 1996 and 2003) with their parents' (between 1968 and 1972).

Overall, the picture is cheerful. Two-thirds of Americans who were children in 1968 and are now in their 30s or 40s enjoy higher household income than their parents did then. The same is true for black Americans.

But black upward mobility consists largely of people from poor families moving up. Blacks born halfway up the income ladder, by contrast, show an alarming tendency to fall down.

Only 31 percent of blacks who were children in 1968 and whose parents were in the middle fifth of America's income distribution now earn more than their parents did. The average household income for this group has actually declined -- from $53,700 (in 2006 dollars) to $44,900. Nearly half fell all the way into the bottom fifth.

These findings have furrowed many brows. CBS News calls them "chilling." The Washington Post laments that the middle-class dream is eluding African-Americans. Many people find the data perplexing. Why, if America really is the land of opportunity, are so many blacks finding it hard to hold onto the middle rungs of the ladder?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some caution is in order. Black families who managed to pull themselves up to the middle of the national income distribution by the late 1960s i.e., within five years of the Civil Rights Act -- must have been hot stuff. Certainly, they would have been near the top of the income distribution for blacks. So it would not be that odd for their children to fall short of their high standards.

Gary Burtless of the Brookings Institution, a think tank, thinks some of the downward mobility unearthed by the Pew study will turn out to be nothing more sinister than a reversion to the mean.

White children whose parents were in the top 20 percent in the late 1960s have also fallen slightly behind their parents. But nothing like as dramatically as middle-income blacks have.

Furthermore, at all income levels, blacks were less likely than whites to surpass their parents. (Overall, blacks and whites were equally likely to be upwardly mobile, but this was because anyone who starts at the bottom has more room to climb, and more blacks started at the bottom.)

Is racism to blame for downward mobility among middle-class blacks? Probably not much. Discrimination is far from dead, but it is hard to argue that it has intensified since the 1960s.

The grease on the ladder must have other ingredients, too. An oft-cited one is the changing structure of the economy. Forty years ago a man with a high school diploma could work at a steel factory for a middle-class salary. Nowadays good jobs typically require a college degree, which black men are less likely than whites to have.

Black men who worked full-time in 2004 earned 22 percent less than white men did, and fewer of them were employed at all.

Another big change since the 1960s is that the black family has all but disintegrated. In 1969 two-thirds of blacks in their 30s were married. Three decades later, 42 percent were. White families have gone non-nuclear too, but much less dramatically.

This affects household income. Other things being equal, two working parents earn more than one. White household incomes have risen sharply in the past generation largely because white women are now far more likely to work outside the home. The richest households typically consist of two professionals, married to each other and working full-time.

Few black households look like this. Black women, who have always worked outside the home in large numbers, now earn 95 percent as much as white women. But they are more likely to be sole breadwinners. And for those who want to marry a black man of similar status, the odds are unkind. For every 100 black female college graduates, there are only 70 black male ones.

A third factor is that even when blacks earn the same as whites, they tend to be less wealthy. In 2000 the average white household in the bottom fifth of income-earners was worth $24,000. For black households the figure was $57 -- less than O'Neal might spend on lunch. Whites in the middle fifth were five times wealthier than their black counterparts; those in the top fifth were three times more so.

Dalton Conley, a sociology professor at New York University and the author of "Being Black, Living in the Red," thinks this explains a lot. Extra cash cushions whites against temporary setbacks, such as losing a job or falling sick. It makes it easier to buy a home near a good school, and to borrow money for university.

Blacks are less likely to graduate from college than whites with the same family income, but the gap disappears if you compare families with the same income and net worth. Wealthier parents can more easily lend their offspring cash to start a business, and assets mean you can plan for the future.

So what can blacks do to keep their grip on the ladder? Financial education is one big thing, says Dawn Franklin of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

As the recent collapse of the subprime-mortgage market shows, people without assets need to be careful how much they borrow, and on what terms. "Just because a bank says yes to you doesn't mean you got a good deal," she says.

Hi all,

Please find Correct The Record's weekend talking points package both attached and below. Thanks!

1.23.15 Weekend Package

1. Hillary Clinton: Energy and the Environment
2. Hillary Clinton: Tough on Terrorism
3. Hillary Clinton: A Lifetime Champion of the Middle Class
4. Hillary Clinton: Tops New National Poll

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON ON ENERGY AND THE ENVIRONMENT

"So to those who doubt the science of climate change and who lack faith in American innovation, just tell them, look at the record and look at what's already happening across the United States … We are already advancing clean energy solutions that can begin turning this tide and can make America the clean energy superpower for the 21st century. We have the opportunity to invest in the infrastructure of the future resilient enough to withstand the effects of climate change we won't be able to avoid…"
– Hillary Clinton remarks to the League of Conservation Voters, 12/1/14

MESSAGE: Hillary Clinton recognizes the realities of climate change and has fought to move to cleaner energy to create green jobs, boost our economy and preserve the natural wonder of creation for the next generation.

- In the Senate, Hillary Clinton boosted alternative energy power and fought for clean energy solutions.
  - Hillary Clinton voted for tax credits for electricity produced from renewable energy sources and proposed permanent tax credits for wind and solar production.
  - She proposed getting big oil companies to reinvest some of their excess profits toward developing smarter energy technologies like fuel-efficient cars and wind and solar power.
  - Senator Clinton repeatedly cosponsored the Clean Power Act to get power plants to reduce harmful air pollution.
  - She introduced legislation to make federal buildings more energy efficient.
  - Hillary cosponsored the Diesel Emissions Reductions Act to increase investment in technologies to reduce pollution from diesel-powered trucks.
- As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton prioritized the fight against climate change as a matter of foreign policy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Secretary Clinton appointed a Special Envoy for Climate Change to serve as an advisor on international climate change policy.
- She established the Bureau of Energy Resources to channel the domestic energy boom to advance American interests around the world and address the threat of climate change posed by the world's energy consumption. [combined two bullets from other two sets of TPs]
- During Secretary Clinton's tenure, the Bureau of Energy Resources helped European nations reduce their dependence on Russian gas, lessening Putin's leverage over Ukraine and Europe's energy supply.

- Secretary Clinton led the way through partnerships and developed incentives to encourage cooperation and progress toward reducing our footprint on the environment.
  - Secretary Clinton helped negotiate an unprecedented agreement between all major economies to commit to curb carbon emissions through 2020.
  - She promoted the development of clean energy projects in a regional partnership with countries in North, Central, and South America and the Caribbean through the Energy and Climate Partnership of the Americas.
  - She signed an agreement with Brazil to strengthen cooperation as our countries work together to meet the grave challenge of global climate change.
  - She implemented 18 EcoPartnerships with China to collaborate on clean energy, sustainable development, and environmental issues.
  - She launched the U.S. Africa Clean Energy Finance Initiative to drive private sector investment into Africa's clean energy sector.
  - Recognizing that dirty cookstoves kill nearly 2 million people a year and are harmful to the environment, Secretary Clinton took action and launched the Global Alliance for Clean Cookstoves in order to save lives and protect our planet.

TALKING POINTS: TOUGH ON TERRORISM

MESSAGE: In a changing and unpredictable world, Hillary Clinton's leadership on issues of national security has kept America secure and helped make the world a safer place.

KEY POINTS:

As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton worked through diplomatic channels to help the United States fight terrorism and safeguard our national security.

- Secretary Clinton made the case for the raid to bring Osama bin Laden to justice.
- Clinton built relationships with key players in the Middle East and funded counterterrorism training initiatives.
- Through negotiations with Russia, Clinton successfully worked to reduce the number of nuclear missile launchers in the world.
- Clinton built and maintained a coalition to enact the toughest sanctions in Iran's history in order to encourage Iran to abandon, or at least stall, its nuclear program.
- Clinton negotiated the Gaza cease-fire between Israelis and Palestinians, helping avert an all-out war in Gaza.
- Clinton played a role to end the war in Iraq and begin a transition to civilian society in Afghanistan.
- Clinton instituted new roles at the State Department to fight terrorism:
  - Clinton created the Center for Strategic Counterterrorism Communications to combat Al-Qaeda's growing influence online.
  - Clinton established the Bureau of Counterterrorism to advance counterterrorism objectives and our national security.

- Clinton identified and led on important issues which affect our national security, such as the global empowerment of women and climate change.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Clinton worked to empower women and girls around the world to participate in their economies. This helps make economies stronger and more stable.

- Clinton prioritized addressing climate change in her time at the State Department. Weather events caused by climate change can lead to famine and destroyed infrastructure, which increase instability and unrest.

Serving as a United States Senator representing New York during September 11, 2001, Hillary Clinton made it a priority to urge the pursuit of justice against Al Qaeda and improve our nation's efforts to combat terrorism.

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON: A LIFETIME CHAMPION OF THE MIDDLE CLASS

"With all due respect, it is not rich people who made America great. It is the vast American middle class. It is the upward mobility of people who thought they could do better than their parents."

–Hillary Clinton

MESSAGE: Hillary Clinton has dedicated her life to ensuring that hardworking Americans can succeed. In uncertain times, families need faith that opportunity for their children and grandchildren is alive and well. Hillary Clinton wants the American Dream to be a real possibility for every child and every family across our nation.

Hillary Clinton knows that tomorrow's shared success starts with today's child, and her dedication to children began long before she ever entered public office. In fact, her first job out of law school was for the newly-formed Children's Defense Fund, an organization she would later chair.

Hillary Clinton has worked to expand access to early childhood education for children of lower-income families. As First Lady of Arkansas, Hillary Clinton introduced her husband to the HIPPY program, which expanded early childhood education to economically disadvantaged children. In the Senate, Clinton partnered with Kit Bond in an effort to expand voluntary full-day pre-K for children from low-income families. Today, as part of the Too Small to Fail Initiative to improve the health and well-being of children five and under, Hillary Clinton is working to close the "word gap" for kids in low-income families who often have smaller vocabularies than their classmates.

Hillary Clinton has worked to increase health coverage for millions of children in low-income and working families through the State Children's Health Insurance Program, a program she helped created as First Lady. In the Senate, Hillary Clinton looked for ways to strengthen the program, introducing bills to allow states to expand it.

Hillary Clinton's record proves she believes that every American should be able to earn an equal day's pay for an equal day's work. As a Senator, Hillary Clinton introduced the Paycheck Fairness Act and was an original cosponsor of the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act.

In the Senate, Hillary Clinton supported increasing the minimum wage and voted repeatedly to protect and increase it. She was an original cosponsor of the Fair Minimum Wage Act of 2007, and authored the 2006 and 2007 Standing with Minimum Wage Act to tie Congressional salary increases to an increase in the minimum wage.

As a Senator, Hillary Clinton supported progressive tax policies that required millionaires to pay their fair share. She opposed tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans and corporations in 2001 and 2003, and she supported a variety of middle-class tax cuts, including tax credits for student loan recipients, and keeping in place the tax cuts for those who make under $250,000 a year.

- Clinton has said "that inherited wealth and concentrated wealth is not good for America," and she has consistently voted against repealing the estate tax on millionaires, doing so in 2001, 2002, and 2006.

Hillary Clinton supported working families going through difficult times through no fault of their own. In the Senate, she was a bipartisan leader on fighting to extend emergency unemployment benefits.

BOTTOM LINE: Leading the charge for equal pay for equal work, fighting to increase wages, strongly advocating for progressive tax policies and access to education and healthcare to help middle-class families – Hillary Clinton has fought for an America and a future where everyone can rise to their potential.

HILLARY CLINTON'S RECENT STATEMENTS ON THE MIDDLE CLASS

In her many public appearances over the past year, Hillary Clinton has continued to advocate for the middle class by sharing her vision all over the country:

In a speech to a women-focused event for Democrat Tom Wolf, "Clinton focused on 'hard-working families' and restoring America's luster and a strong middle class with 'a fresh start.'" According to Politico, Clinton "gave one of her strongest political speeches since her 2008 campaign ended in June 2008 as she headlined a women-focused event for Democratic gubernatorial Tom Wolf in Pennsylvania. Clinton focused on 'hard-working families' and restoring America's luster and a strong middle class with 'a fresh start,' as well as women's pay equity and her gauzy first days as a new grandmother. For the first time in months, Clinton's public talk was neither a dry recitation of public policy nor a self-reflection about her tenure as secretary of state." [Politico , 10/9/14]

Clinton's language at a women-focused event for Democrat Tom Wolf was "some of her strongest about rebuilding the middle class." According to Politico, "The remarks were some of her strongest about rebuilding the middle class. They came after she was accused of being out of touch for her comment in June about being 'dead broke' when she left the White House, and for giving paid speeches at exorbitant prices." [Politico , 10/9/14]

The theme of Clinton's speech at an event for Pennsylvania gubernatorial candidate Tom Wolf was working families. According to BuzzFeed, "The thread running through Clinton's message here in Pennsylvania, the state she won six years ago in a primary against Barack Obama, was working families — a theme she teased repeatedly throughout her speech with populist undertones, mentions of her granddaughter, and stories about her own trips as a child to Scranton, where Clinton's father, Hugh, was born to a working-class immigrant family." [BuzzFeed , 9/9/14]

In Pennsylvania, Clinton criticized the power of corporations, siding with middle-class families. According to the Wall Street Journal, "Though she and her husband have raised more than $1 billion from U.S. companies and corporate officials over the last two decades, Mrs. Clinton signaled that she sided with everyday families struggling to pay bills and keep afloat. Corporations, she said, 'seem to have all the rights, but none of the responsibilities of people …' She decried practices that pay women less than men for the same work and took aim at politicians who've belittled women's rights. 'A 20th century economy will not work for 21st century families,' she said." [Wall Street Journal , 9/9/14]

Hillary Clinton's speeches are revealing a theme that she would fight to restore and re-open the middle class. According to TPM, "The notion of 'upward mobility' was central to Clinton's message to the New American audience in May. She described it as 'time-tested wisdom' that was 'at the heart of what I believe is the basic bargain of America.'… Here is how Clinton described that basic bargain of America, as she sees it, in May: 'No matter who you are or where you come from, if you work hard and play by the rules, you'll have the opportunity to build a good life for yourself and your family.'" [TPM , 9/22/14]

Hillary Clinton's speeches are revealing a theme that she can address income inequality and gender inequality. According to TPM, "So income inequality has been a big part of the message. But it's also been married to inequality between the sexes. At both the New American and CAP events, the same factoid made an appearance: That three-quarters of jobs that rely on tips -- like 'waiters, bartenders and hairstylists' as she said on both occasions -- are held by women…. And she said Thursday that these issues should be used to mobilize voters -- in the 2014 midterms and moving forward." [TPM , 9/22/14]

In recent speeches, Clinton has taken a tougher stance on big business, likely in "an effort to find the balance between populism and her familiar centrism" she may need in 2016, according to Reuters. According to Reuters, "Long viewed as an ally by Wall Street, likely 2016 presidential contender Hillary Clinton has increasingly been taking banks and big business to task while on the campaign trail for Democrats across the country…. This is a change of tone for the former New York senator, who faced criticism for her Wall Street ties as recently as September, after appearing with Goldman Sachs (GS.N) chief executive Lloyd Blankfein. Allies and analysts see it as an effort to find the balance between populism and her familiar centrism that Clinton may need in order to broaden her appeal in a potential 2016 Democratic primary contest." [Reuters , 11/2/14]

During a New Hampshire midterm event, Clinton discussed expanding economic opportunity and raising the minimum wage. According to the Boston Globe, "Clinton spoke in New Hampshire about expanding economic opportunity, raising the minimum wage, and protecting women's rights. She acknowledged that, across the country, there is 'a lot of anxiety and insecurity.' But the former secretary of state and US senator from New York struck a hopeful note: She bookended her remarks talking about her new granddaughter and said seeing another generation in the family focuses the mind on what's important. Clinton said she and her husband were raised to believe the American Dream was within your reach if you worked hard. 'You should not,' Clinton told a packed gymnasium, 'have to be the grandchild of a governor or a senator or a former secretary of state or a former president to believe that the American Dream is in your reach.'" [Boston Globe , 11/2/14]

In midterm campaign appearances, Clinton has been echoing populist notes. According to Bloomberg, Clinton "has been sounding more populist notes of late as a campaign-trail advocate for Democratic candidates who are on the ballot next week. That's an important turn as she contemplates a run for president in 2016 because Clinton's biggest weakness among Democrats, and some Republicans, is the perception that she's too close to Wall Street and corporate America…. And the more anti-corporate tone is pleasing to the ears of liberals who have pined for Senator Elizabeth Warren, a scourge of Wall Street banks, to challenge Clinton for the Democratic nomination. And, they say, it's a message Clinton can use against Republicans because many in the GOP have turned wary of Wall Street and big corporations since the 2008 financial crash." [Bloomberg , 10/27/14]

During a midterm appearance in New York, Clinton clarified earlier comments about companies and job creation, while maintaining the same theme: "Clinton's for the little guy." According to Bloomberg, "Days after Republicans feasted on her claim that corporations don't create jobs, Hillary Clinton tried Monday to 'be absolutely clear about what I've been saying for a couple of decades.' 'So-called trickle-down economics has failed,' Clinton said as she stumped for Representative Sean Patrick Maloney in New York. 'Our economy grows when businesses and entrepreneurs create good-paying jobs here in an America where workers and families are empowered to build from the bottom up and the middle out–not when we hand out tax breaks for corporations that outsource jobs or stash their profits overseas.' While campaigning Friday for Massachusetts gubernatorial candidate Martha Coakley, Clinton created a stir–and drew criticism from Republicans–by saying, 'Don't let anybody tell you that it's corporations and businesses that create jobs.'…The cleaned-up message, though, hits at the same theme: Clinton's for the little guy." [Bloomberg , 10/27/14]

While campaigning for Democrats in the midterm election, Clinton frequently tells voters that "everyone deserves a second chance, a third chance." According to a CNN, an investigation into Clinton's most common lines on the trail found that Clinton frequently tells voters, "'Everyone deserves a second chance, a third chance…' Clinton has focused a great deal on economic populism on the stump, an issue other Democrats thinking about seeking the presidency in 2016 have started to tweak Clinton on. 'Everyone deserves a second chance, a third chance to keep going and to make something of themselves,' Clinton said in Iowa earlier this year. 'That was one of the most important lessons of my life.' Clinton usually uses the line to encourage compassion from a crowd, and to show that she has compassion, too." [CNN , 10/28/14]

In a San Francisco speech, Clinton revealed some of what may be her economic message: "Who's on your side?" According to the Washington Post, "Here in San Francisco on Monday, Clinton gave a spirited call to arms to Democrats as she road-tested what is likely to be her economic message if she runs again. The November midterms, she said, come down 'to a simple question: Who's on your side?' She sounded close to her party's populist marrow when she decried the erosion of economic security for many working Americans, and a long way from her tone-deaf remark earlier this year about being 'dead broke' when she and Bill Clinton left the White House in 2000. 'It's time to elect leaders who will fight for everyone to get a fair shot at the American dream,' Hillary Clinton said." [Washington Post, 10/21/14]

Hillary Clinton's speeches are revealing a theme that she could finish the economic recovery begun by Obama. According to TPM, "Clinton seems to have a handle of the line she wants to toe: Obama saved us from worse economic struggles (as his defenders have been saying for years), but the work isn't over. Implicit, of course, is that she -- if she runs -- would finish the job. 'We haven't seen a full recovery from the economic crash,' Clinton said Thursday at CAP. 'When the president came in, he deserves an enormous amount of credit for staunching the bleeding and preventing a further deterioration and getting us out of that ditch we were in. But we know unless we change our policies, a lot of the benefits are not going to be broadly shared.' 'It's not just about more jobs for more people and better paying jobs,' she said. 'It's making sure that the people themselves get to keep those benefits and build that future back that they are so desperate to see for themselves.'" [TPM , 9/22/14]

In an interview with PBS, Hillary said : "Bill and I have had terrific opportunities, both of us…have worked hard, but we've been grateful for everything that we've been able to achieve, and sadly that's just not true for most Americans today…It's important that we all try to figure out what we're going to do, and that's what I've done my entire life, fighting for a higher minimum wage, or family leave…equal pay for equal work…I think my record speaks for itself."

At a speech at the Aspen Ideas Festival, Hillary said : "At the end of the day, we're all on the same team. We're on the American team. And we've got to do a better job of getting our economy growing again and producing results and renewing the American Dream so that Americans feel that they have a stake in the future and that the economy and the political system is not stacked against them, because that will erode the trust that is at the basis of our democracy."

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON TOPS NEW NATIONAL POLL

BACKGROUND: A new ABC News/Washington Post poll conducted January 12-15, 2015 finds that Hillary Clinton leads each of the top potential GOP candidates in hypothetical matchups.

THE POLL:

- According to the poll, Hillary beats all other potential GOP contenders polled by double digits.

- In head-to-head matchups, Clinton leads Jeb Bush 54%-41%, Mitt Romney 55%-40%, Chris Christie 53%-40%, Rand Paul 54%-41%, and Mike Huckabee 56%-39%.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Hillary Clinton continues to connect with Democrats, Independents and Americans of all backgrounds who are hungry for her experience and vision. Because of Hillary Clinton's years of public service, her strong record as a leader, and her commitment to being a voice to the voiceless, she has the support of so many Americans.

This latest poll is in line with what others polls and pundits have been showing for months – that Hillary Clinton has unprecedented support behind her, despite the onslaught of Republican attacks against her.

- Clinton is extremely popular among Democrats: an NBC/Marist poll from July 7-13, 2014 puts her favorability/unfavorability rating in Iowa at 89 percent/6 percent; in New Hampshire it's even higher, at 94 percent/4 percent.

- In polls conducted this summer in Ohio , New Jersey and Florida , Hillary Clinton had commanding leads over potential 2016 GOP contenders.

- According to a Quinnipiac press release on the Ohio poll, "Secretary Clinton, on the other hand, is almost everyone's favorite candidate."

- Regarding the New Jersey poll, a Quinnipiac official stated , "As Gov. Christopher Christie traipses around the nation, his presidential potential seems alive, but former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, the adopted girl next door, easily beats him in his home state."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Based on the Florida poll, CNN reported that "Hillary Clinton is the clear 2016 frontrunner in the nation's largest presidential battleground state."

Make sure the oil spill in the Gulf doesn't become "business as usual"

Hello Mary,

We need your help to stand up to Big Oil

We don't think the sea should be flammable.

The latest heartbreaking new s from BP's Deep Water Horizon oil spill show s that parts of the noxious, 10 mile long, 300 foot wide surface slick and the massive sub-surface plumes have been picked up by the Gulf's Loop Current. It is likely this will spread the spill and its devastating impacts around the tip of Florida and up the Atlantic Coast. First stop: the fragile, unique, and irreplaceable Florida Keys coral reef ecosystems...in as little as a w eek.

And w e still have no real idea of the spill's reach and the potential damage it could cause. This is w hy w e need your help Mary to make sure that spills of this kind don't become "business as usual." Help us ensure a clean energy future today!

Millions in taxpayer dollars and donations to non-profit organizations are being spent to try to prevent even more damage from being done. But the oil keeps gushing. The epic scale of BP's failure has overw helmed nearly all efforts. Small businesses and individuals are suffering staggering personal losses. And the oil keeps gushing.

Throughout our history Clean Water Action has opposed offshore oil exploration projects because of the many risks to w ater resources. Clean Water Action is w orking to ensure a clean energy future that protects w ater and rejects dirty, expensive, and unsafe technologies, like more off-shore drilling, coal and nuclear power.

Mary, your support for our efforts is vital to ensuring this tragedy is not repeated.

Big Oil and the rest of the dirty energy industry are right now focusing on making sure that the energy and climate bills before Congress continue to favor the dirty, polluting energy sources of the past - including more offshore drilling, coal, and nuclear - and include taxpayer support for failed energy policies that degrade and deplete our water.

With your support, Mary, Clean Water Action and our allies w ill stand-up to Big Oil and dirty energy and advance a clean energy future.

Clean Water Action w ill keep the pressure on public officials at every level - w ith your help - so they know they w ill be held accountable for protecting our w ater.

Yours for Clean Water,

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Appearance in Des Moines, IA 08/08/08

Hello All,
Just got off the phone with our tracker, Lee, on the ground in Des Moines, IA. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS:

- Advocates free trade, says agreement with S Korea could make Iowans $10 more per pig/hog
- Repeats that he's "all for" inflating our tires but that's not an energy plan, that's a public service announcement
- Tells crowd he's against ethanol subsidies but for renewable fuels

Des Moines, IA: McCain Appearance at State Fair 08/08/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background Details

- Unidentified woman gives brief introductory remarks
- Over 200 people in crowd listening to McCain speak
- McCain gives remarks from atop haystacks in Fairground
- Cindy with McCain
- Following brief remarks, McCain walks through fair shaking hands; eating fair fare; walks through agriculture building
    - about 50 people following McCain with encouraging words; yelling 'pick mitt' and offering money
- Tracker didn't see any protesters

Speech Highlights

- TY for being here, great to be back in heartland, IA state fair is great
- I understand yesterday a few corn dogs were consumed a world-record -- I just came from my favorite place- seeing Freight Train, a fat pig-- Next we're going to eat a deep-fried twinkie and pork on a stick. I love the heartland, a chance to meet and greet the heartland.
- People from all over the world are consuming the quality products produced right here in Iowa. I will make sure every market in the world is open to your products. Some of the great products--talking to Craig Lang and Bill Northie, and they told me there's $150 to be made for every pig/hog raised here. $30 of those dollars are made from internatl exports. If we approve free trade agreement w/ S Korea, $10 more can be made. Your agricultural products can feed the world.
- We are facing an energy crisis in USA. Lowest-income Americans are suffering the most. We must achieve energy independence. When I'm POTUS, we will. We can't spend $700B to countries that don't like us very much.
- [microphone feedback] This microphone is brought to you c/o DNC.
- I have a plan to achieve energy independence: "all of the above", the Lexington Project. We have to include nuclear. We're a long way from the ocean but we have to drill offshore - drill here, drill now. Obama's opposed to offshore drilling and he said we have to inflate our tires. I'm all for inflating our tires but that's not an energy plan, that's a PSA.
- We're having fun w/ this campaign. We should enjoy this. Obama should come here with me and talk to you .
- TY vets for what you've done in Iraq, Afghanistan. The bravest and most professional military is the one we have today.
- We are winning in Iraq and we have succeeded adn we will bring the troops home with honor and victory and not in defeat as would've happened if my---

- And can I tell you a quick story that helped me put everything in perspective, 'as we politicians need to do from time to time': Matthew Stanley story.
- I want to be POTUS b/c I want to inspire a generation to serve a cause greater than self.
- We can recover our economy and create a better world and it is reaffirmed here in IA.
- We will disagree from time to time: I believe in renewable fuels, I don't agree with ethanol subsidies

Perspective - Climate Diplomacy: A Strategy for American Leadership

In December, 2015, the world will gather in Paris in an attempt to finally address the challenge of climate change. The stakes are high: failure would only make addressing climate change more costly and difficult and could have repercussions on broader national security goals. But “Climate Diplomacy” is not just about a single conference in Paris: it must be a bipartisan, long-standing priority for the U.S. government. This paper lays out why climate diplomacy is important and outlines a strategy to deploy it.

Subject:	Trades Dinner Sunday

Hi John
Milia reached out about the Building Trades dinner on Sunday night in Washington DC. I thought it might be helpful to provide some further background. I am working on a more detailed memo for you to have in hand tomorrow. The dinner was initiated by the Mike Monroe from the Building Trades for two reasons...

1. Bring together some key trades unions that have specific concerns about energy. Mike felt that giving them a off the record opportunity to talk with you about the importance of that particular industry to their unions and members would be beneficial for them and us.

2. This dinner will help set up HRC's presentation on September 9th for the Building Trades Council. It could be informative to that presentation.

Right now we have several building trades that are ready to endorse: Painters, Operating Engineers, Bricklayers and Plumbers.

(The Carpenters are ready to go soon too but are not in either the AFL-CIO or the Building Trades Council. HRC will be visiting their Las Vegas facility next week with Pres. McCarron. We're good here.)

Two key unions that we are need in to continue to work are the Laborers and IBEW. Mike is working hard to get LIUNA to the dinner.

In addition you should know that Friday I have worked with policy and the Building Trades council to host four different 30 minute conversations with the trades and our policy shop on these issues: 1. Existing nuclear and relicensing issues 2. Opportunities in building efficiency 3. Pipeline modernization and construction 4. Clean Power Plan. I can have a brief together for you from that conversation to assist with Sunday's dinner.

Last, Mike is getting to me RSVPs today. If we do not have either Laborers or IBEW I think we reschedule. I will know this today and will let you know asap.

Happy to discuss and please let me know what you think.
Thanks!
Nikki

MAJOR DOMESTIC INITIATIVES

Alliance for a Healthier Generation

The Alliance conducted a satellite media tour with Billy Blanks and Tara Stiles to showcase the Fit for a Healthier Generation campaign aimed at making kids more active in schools. The tour reached more than 20 million people across the country.

24 Hour Fitness and Cigna have signed on to the Alliance's Healthcare Initiative and will offer their employees and employer groups, respectively, extended visits to primary care practitioners and covered visits to registered dietitians.

Clinton Health Matters Initiative

CHMI will meet with the PGA Tour later this week to finalize details on launching the CHMI community program in the Greater Jacksonville area.

CHMI met with Commissioner Kelly's team last week to discuss the details of the event on prescription drug abuse and further collaboration. Due to scheduling constraints, the event will take place in the spring on an NYC campus. Meanwhile, CHMI will be working with the NYPD to convene NYC college and university presidents to discuss ways in which these campuses can educate their students on the dangers of prescription drugs and the mixing of these drugs with other substances.

Clinton Economic Opportunity Initiative

CEO met with Kevin Langley, the former Global Chairman of the Entrepreneurs Organization (EO), to discuss possible partnership opportunities between EO and CEO. The Entrepreneurs' Organization (EO) is a global business network of over 8,000 business owners in 122 chapters and 35 countries. Conversation centered upon the possibility of leveraging EO's New York and New Orleans chapters to create a small business event geared towards providing much needed advice and support to small business owners who were still in the midst of dealing with the damages brought on by Hurricane Sandy. Kevin was able to give valuable advice and emotional support to EO member and former EMP mentee Victor Chan, a small business owner whose business survived Hurricane Katrina. Kevin counseled Victor on how best to keep his South Street Seaport area restaurant business alive amidst a host of financing and real estate issues that have threatened to put him out of business. CEO will be continuing exploratory conversations with EO around how EO New Orleans entrepreneurs could be leveraged in a similar manner to support NYC area small business owners impacted by Hurricane Sandy.

Inc. magazine is currently working to gain internal approvals on two possible collaboration opportunities: 1) integration of CEO's Entrepreneur Mentoring Program into the Inc. Business Owner Council in the form of a new business accelerator program and 2) a Women's Summit in collaboration with the Clinton Foundation.

MAJOR INTERNATIONAL INITIATIVES

Clinton Development Initiative

Malawi

The trees project is being reviewed by a large purchaser of carbon credits in Scandinavia for a potential major purchase commitment (up to 40,000 tons per year). COTAP, the carbon credits broker in the US that is aiming to be the Kiva of carbon credits, has made over $3,700 in sales of Trees of Hope credits to individual buyers in the few months since signing a marketing agreement with CDI. Bank accounts have been established for Trees of Hope farmers who will be receiving their first payments from carbon sales.

CDI is working on finalizing the long-term lease agreement for the commercial farms. Discussions have begun with John McAslan on developing a master site plan for the commercial farms to help guide renovation and construction of needed infrastructure after leases are in place.

Rwanda

CDI has approached some technical schools and universities to recruit their best students for factory jobs at Mount Meru Soyco Ltd. They will conduct interviews in February and those selected will be sent to a factory in Arusha for a three-month training in March. The Soyco factory is preparing to begin buying raw materials from farmers.

Regarding the AGRA project, all crops are maturing on the field and the team hopes to begin the harvest and mobilize more farmers for the coming season by the end of this month. The CDI team has begun doing field days in the three Districts of the project area—Kayonza District, Kirehe District and Gatsibo District.

CDI has also been supporting the rehabilitation of the ISAR (Institut des Sciences Agronomiques du Rwanda) microbiology lab to be able to produce more inoculums. The lab has bought new equipment with CDI's support.

Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative

Peru

CGSGI's cataract surgery program has reached 49, 646 surgeries. The 50,000 cataracts surgery goal is expected to be met by the end of February.

CGSGI is finalizing an MOU with the Peru's Ministry of Tourism to begin capacity building necessary to link small suppliers in Cusco, Peru with that region's hospitality and restaurant sector. The project is expected to launch in March.

Colombia

The Acceso Fund has agreed to capitalize a new Supply Chain Impact Enterprise in Cartagena, Colombia with USD $2.1 million. This enterprise is expected to begin operations in April and will procure agricultural products and seafood from local suppliers for resale to the hospitality, restaurant and supermarket markets along Colombia's caribbean coast. The business will provide distribution, warehousing, processing and logistics for the suppliers reducing the costs to both suppliers and buyers and creating opportunities for low income suppliers in the region to broaden their market opportunity and substantially increase their incomes. This is the second new enterprise capitalized by Acceso in Cartagena. The first, a hospitality labor training center, will start its first class in March.

Friends of ASP,

With spring (finally!) upon us, I wanted to share the details on several public and private events that may be of interest -- and what to expect from ASP in the coming months.

On March 21st, we will host Puerto Rico on the Brink: Energy, Economy and Security. Should your schedule allow for you to join us please let me know so I may reserve seating and time with the featured speaker(s) on your behalf.

We also look forward to hosting you in mid-April for the launch of our upcoming paper on Syrian Reconstruction. Final details on this event will be made available in the coming weeks.

While there has been much discussion on U.S.- Cuban relations since December 17th, 2014, there has been little focus on the national security argument for engaging Cuba. ASP is excited to launch a long-term project in this area, beginning with an opening reception on Wednesday, April 20th at the home of ASP Board Member Mr. Scott Gilbert in Miami, Florida. This invitation-only event will feature General John Kelly, USMC (Ret.) Combatant Commander of U.S. Southern Command from 2013-2016.
